Everybody is always waiting for something. Parliament is waiting until after Easter. Skilled labour hankers after strength for fourth and fifth sets, and only just let out so much of their powers earlier as to keep the interest of the piece commercial. So with our legislators now; they are keeping themselves in training, and that is all. When on evening the ranks of the Opposition were seen to be ranged, full, and compact, in hopes of them who came there to draw out of them to behold the inner mysteries of Parliament were raised to the point which can only be satisfied by a thundering debate. The subject was hopeful, too, for it was game. There were expectations that Mr. Bright, who had to be somewhat loud on the matter of the day present; and, in fact, this a furious onslaught would be made on that institution which, in the estimation of pure Conservatism, seems to be second only to the salvation of Church and State. Those who remember the fierce discussions into which the moribund Legislature was galvanised at the end of last Session, when the question of the income-tax was sought to be placed within the unconscious reach of every one who happened to buy a partridge or to adjust the payment of a dressmaker's account, will understand the rule what about to be renewed. It is true that pronunciation of the words "Mr. Speaker" was not so fervent as that Mr. W. E. Forster, who introduced the question, spoke very much as if he could not hear a word of his own speech, and as the bottom of his inclination preferred a pleasant, as an animated being, to a pocher; but he was heard, as he always does, well, and with the ease of long sufficiency. But the other side had two things in their favour—first, a technical objection, which is a common Parliamentary expedient against tampering in one year with the more or less deliberate legislation of the previous one; and, secondly, an assured majority in the House up till now, which has not been hot by any means so sure after that hour. So the Opposition went in heavily for that contemporaneous of demerse their "hear, hear," and "cheer, cheer," which carries all before it to a division, and the matter in hand was swamped and swept away for the time for further. Mr. Bright, who was not without his suggestiveness, because it showed the Conservative party in strength, and gave a broad hint as to what they would do if they could but open one single door which would let them through, got so thoroughly as gone.

There was one night a curious episode in Parliamentary history—namely, a literal dual—of tongues, or rather between two members, which was kept up with wonderful perseverance and tenacity for a period which touched upon hours. The occasion was the Committee on the tobacco duties, and the combatants Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Ayrton. Perhaps there never were two members who were so nearly equally gifted with talking power. Either of them could keep your ears ringing for a week or two at a given time. There is a difference, certainly, if there is such much distinction, in their capability. Mr. Gladstone rolls one like a mighty river; but Mr. Ayrton is more a succession of cataracts. The manner of speech of both, even as the fabled Pactolus might have shown them in the golden flood. But, at last, to be sure, it was the other master of flying words, they often, and mostly though not always, are so in one way, who succumbed to the other, and for the most part there is nothing in them. Mr. Ayrton, because of three thousand Power Hamlets tobacco manufacturers, is only half announced, but announced, for brief, and on the occasion it was curious to see how eagerly he and Mr. Gladstone fought for the last word. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was very loath to be shut himself up with difficulty on a stick; but, like Witherington, he fought up to the stumps with undaunted spirit. His still less opponent jumped up one after another just as the figures do in Mr. Punch's entertainment. As fast as one was knocked on the head up started the other, until lookers-on grew giddy; and, indeed, from how or the other, the matter did at last come to an end, no one's mind was in a state to know, and then the House began to sit down and slept at last. Our own impression is that they compromised the matter, and that the last speeches were made by the clerks at the operatic duet, and sat down simultaneously in mercy to the Chairman of Committee, who was fast sinking into a stated coma, which, if it had been completed, would have proved the longest recorded case of the kind leave the chair." The House could not therefore have resumed, and a Parliamentary adjournment would have arisen, by the refusal of a standing order applies." The result is terrible to contemplate, for the officials of the house were overwhelmed with sitting there, their only hope of release being the sound of the last trump.

To the political philosophic mind one of the most comical things in the world is the Government sitting pledged to be purely neutral. There ought to be no mistake about the meaning of this phrase, as it is applicable to the case for the presentation of corporate petitions at elections, with which the House has been toying this Session. A very delicate matter always exposed to the most jealous consideration should be brought into the Legislature by bribery and its concomitants, and therefore, every now and then, there is an attempt at purification, as that of the House, which, being interested in corruption, that electors outside shall be scarified. The Princes of the blood Royal at one time, and they were undergoing their ordeal, and they were victoriously whipped, and, of course, the sufferings of the whipping boy must have had an immense moral effect upon them. When Britons are lashing the bribed, the agonies of the former cannot but produce penitential results. The process is eminently logical. Mr. J. B. Smith defines virtue as a matter of conscientious man, and could not take a bribe for his vote, A, the elected, would be a pure member of Parliament; but as B base enough to take a bribe when it is offered him, it is his venality which taints the purity of A. Therefore, it you lay your penalties on the giver, so that he can not be corrupt, you are safe. A will be pure. On the credit of the bulk of the House of Commons it may be said that they acknowledge the value of legislation founded on this logical principle, and they have staved off the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill for a vocal because they saw that it had come before them for more than thirty or forty assisted in this inverted process of purification; and even that the whole House would sympathise with it when they too glad to laugh consumedly at Mr. Darby Griffith when he puts an absurdity on science.

A debate on the Galway contract has become an annual event. It is not, generally, amusing; this time it was; and it had two special claims to the notice. The first was, that almost think the most notable one, was that Mr. Barter showed that his blood is not warm. Shielding one's eyes, and listening to his raspy, florid flow of his speech, which, as statistical as argumentative as those he usually delivers, was also animated almost to the point of humanness, one only regretted that the first time one ever talk of the member for Montrose by an occasional intonation of voice and an alteration of his bare and bony with which he usually speaks. For some reason—some say one thing and some another—that which, for want of a more apt term, we will call Mr. Barter's heat, is as hot as ever; and he was on this occasion positively uplifted out of himself. In fact, he made quite a flight, and soared and sang with real acquired ability, and to the great and pleasing surprise in his non-admirers. Then, too, the good genius which must have been about the head of the House and inspiring members of their normal dissemblable, descended on Mr. Whiteside; and, under a softening and genial influence, he became positively delightful. Arguing upon an illustration he had made by means of playful witticisms; while he so modulated his voice and toned down the ordinary acerbity of his demeanour that for the first time one gave him credit for versatility, and inclined to the belief that Parliament has indeed seen more of this rough voyager of the Irish and Frisu advocate than of the cultivated humourist and the master of wit and sarcasm gentleman undoubtedly is. If he is about to adopt a new style, and which he developed last Monday may be the one he has chosen, his place as one of the very first orators in the House is secure. What lies under the surface, however, that are his wonted fires? Tell it not in Gath; but he is positively dull. One perceives that the want of his flowing beard, by the removal of the amputation placed him in the like category with Samson When it is remembered that this matter of the Galway contract was for some time a distinct matter of impeachment against Lord Derby's Government (Mr. Bentinck, speaking behind the first Opposition bench, still retains that point of view), it is not an entirely insignificant circumstance that on the evening on which it was discussed he was absent from his place.

The Lords refuse to be moved, even by Lord Stratheden. This nobleman, who has taken to calling himself by his less ancient title of Campbell, probably in order to keep before the Government the recollection that it was intended that that name should be coupled with an earldom, has at last put his motion on for the recognition of the Confederate States of America. Lord Russell's indisposition must become chronic if he was determined to avoid it; and so, as we suspect, a little arrangement was made to let Lord Stratheden have his swing and have done with it. We use the word swing advisedly for the noble Lord's oratory may be characterised as a development of swing, mentality and bodily. Imagine the pendulum of a clock subjected to a series of electric shocks, which do not stop but only quicken its beat, and you have the case before you. Or picture that in which this noble Lord pumps out his enthusiasm. Oh! the inestimable purity of the pith which these orators put into us! Why are not the walls of the Houses of Parliament lined with mirrors!

THE FARM.

Scarce has shown itself during the last few days very gloriously in Lombardy and Venetia, but the land is now warm for the grass. The lambing season has been a very precarious one, and the abundant crop of turnips has brought its fatal spring heritage. The account on the Continent is much the same as in England. Spain, with the most mutton leaps up, well, even with the fleece off; so, as the old proverb has it, Cheese will be indeed said to "crave a golden host."

Beyond a west country one of 500 "nearly two-tooth wethers" and about 20 shorthorns, principally of Scottish blood, and 41 working oxen, at Mr. Canning's, of Chiselden, near Swindon, on Wednesday, there is no sale of importance next week. The first sale of the Babraham shorthorns, at Babraham, near Newmarket and Cherry Hinton, on Wednesday 82 lots—62 females and 20 bulls. Englishman, the second prize winner at the Royal Show, Roan Duke, the property of Mr. Torr, of Cuddler Rose, a son of Sir Charles and The Beauty, and one of the five Battersea cows, two of which did disgrace to Scotland, and while Sir Charles, who was also a sufferer, was unfortunately choked in his van as he came through London. It is from this son of Nicholson and Mr. Cruickshank—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—the best derives much of its later strength: and, except through Red Roan, Darling, there is not a trace of the dash of Booth blood in the herd. The six tribes are represented in the first-sale catalogue, and the Dodonas, which go back to Mr. Mason's No. 1, number 14 females and 4 bulls. Mr. Webb bought her as barren at Warwick in '58; she produced twin heifer calves and then another, and from two of them, Duchess of Cambridge and Duchess of Gloucester, the present Duke of Oxford's dam are 29 females and 10 males. She, too, was originally a speculative purchase, and her pedigree is remarkable. Her dam, Duchess 3rd, a remarkable milker, is lot 1 in the sale. The Bodice tribe goes back to old Besey, by Holleon, and four females and three males represent Mr. Jaliard's Bodice, by Duke of Oxford, and Bodice, by Belvedere, and five; and Duffy Gwynne, from Mr. Tanqueray, has three females. The last tribe is that of Mr. Webb's Beauties, by Duke of Oxford, Beauty, for which Mr. Webb bid so determinedly at the Oobham sale in 1860. Beauty has been a barren cow, but she has produced twin calves from her and her daughters, as her Red Rose, by Marmaduke, has had twins twice within eleven months. The lots are a pair of heifers, and the first pair of Mr. Cannon's Canterbury tribe, which is believed to be in calf, which proved to be the case with the only heifer forwarded to Mr. Webb's sale. Why are the Beauties not to have paid a fitting compliment to the memory of their old colleague by specially reserving for the sale of the herd? Nothing could point so to the inconvenience of members who will be absent from town for the Easter holidays, and who pressed their motion for the 16th to a division.

Mr. Forster's motion on the game laws was brought forward in a very considerate manner, and was received by the House in marked contrast to the hesitating fashion in which this subject, one of the most delicate and difficult of the day, and hardly one for slang nicknames, is too often treated by those who are the most competent to serve the farmer. Still the proposition was made at least a Session too soon. The Bill of the Government for the amendment of the laws taken before the last Committee pretty nearly applies now, and it is to be hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will bring upon the working of the law of last year, which must perforce have formed one of the most important elements of the inquiry. Lord Derby's Government, which took the evidence of witnesses at a heavy expense to inquire in April respecting the operations of a law that was not in force until the middle of the month of August, but in this case the law had been in a most undecided state with the Government, and the Commissioners appointed to take the heads of the county police, &c., would have been practically called on to deliver their opinions out of the fulness of not a quarter of a year's experience. Mr. Forster, a member of the Board of Trade, himself and a well-known practical agriculturist, took this commonsense ground in his speech. Happily, there was no division fort either in his or Mr. Forster's speeches for the antagonists of the game laws. The Bill of last year and the Poaching Act is a rank failure. The testimony of the heads of the county police, both as furnished to the speakers and to the Quarter Sessions, and to the Commissioners, proves that the Acts are more valuable, as the great body of them were not favourable to the measure at all, and the Bill was passed against their wishes. Another year will also serve to test the doctrine that the Act is certain to increase the game, a question upon which its opponents have paid much prophetic stress. Even the great majority that the police would be taken off their night duties to watch for poachers is practically not the case, as only one in five of the members of the police should keep their eyes on the worst characters in the parish. As Mr. Forster observed, "Every man is on duty a sharp night, in the season of the year," tying it on with gun or gin, and this is not the case. The majority was made up principally by the country party, who fought fiercely for the game preserves as pertinaciously thirty-eight times in the lobby last Session, but it is equally certain that the measure was not a party one, for to-fed fat an ancient grudge, always vote against "the squire," be the question what it may. The Bill was carried by 39 votes, and very efficiently by the greatest impartiality on the part of the magistrates, and fearless independence and tact on that of the county police, and there is no doubt that the Act will be found to work well, and improve one of the most valuable on the statute book. It may, we long, and not only in attention of the House to it by a fair better understanding between landlords and tenants about the oppressive overpreserving of game, and the consequent damage to the position to discuss calmly while they were dared and bearded by a set of rascals night after night—a thing which no Englishman can bear—and the tenants may with a little forbearance, and a little more there will be no pretext for refusing the committee next session.

The Veterinarian for March contains a paper by Mr. Greaves, V.S., of Manchester, on the colic controversy between this magazine and the Edinburgh Veterinary Review. Mr. Greaves, it seems, relies on hypammonia fortes, given in half-drachm doses in a pint of water, as an "almost eletrical" antispasmodic; while Professor Gamgee gives 1 oz. of the tincture of opium in a pint of linseed application they also differ. There are also two papers by students (Messrs. Dunbuzzy and Sutton) in the Veterinarian on the cause of the late relating his treatment of the broken foreleg of a cow, and the other on the inflammation of the eyelids in sheep, accompanied by a sketch of the author's "improved Medicine and Ointment Box," with its separate tapes thereof. The bulletin department gives a rather dismal account of the ravages of the pulmonic plague in Cheshire, and especially on the borders of the Severn. The Rinderpest still rages among the herds of Hungary and Bohemia, and is said to be of so contagious a type that even sheep are affected by it, a new feature upon which the editors, Professors Morton and Simonds, will no doubt collect some interesting evidence. The quarterly cavalry casualty muster has been made out the 30th of January, and it appears that, after discharging six hundred, there remain 7,000 horses in the regiments of the Line. The inquiry committee has ascertained that "the number of practising veterinary surgeons throughout the kingdom in 1814, while the number of those who assume the title is 1244, and of these practising as farriers 1189."

In Victoria, Vancouver Island, there was last spring an Indian population of 2500. This number has been reduced to about 50 by the ravages of smallpox.

The Civil Service Estimates for the colonial, consular, and other foreign services amount to £1,000,000 sterling, and exceed by and show a net decrease as compared with last year's estimates, of £393,831.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Some legislative notices has been taken of the dreadful accidents which cast a gloom over the festivities of the 10th of March. Mr. Hervey Lewis moved, in the House of Commons, on Tuesday night, for a return of the number of persons killed or injured in the streets of London on the day of the Royal entry and on the night of the illuminations. As regards the former, the return of fatal casualties will, we apprehend, be nil; but the list of calamities on the night of the wedding has reached, by this time, an appalling figure. To test these records to completion, Mr. Norris moved for the return not of those who met their death or suffered other injury on the occasion of the remains of the Duke of Kent being borne in state at Chelsea Hospital, and also sought information as to the means employed to prevent the recurrence of such disasters.

Well do we remember the grim tragedy that attended the lying in state. The scene of awful stillness, with the motionless Yeomen of the Guard, the dimly-lighted chamber, the grim catafalque, and the tawny catafalques, blazing with strange lights, was suddenly changed into a pandemonium by the cries of fire in the Mansion. Men, women and children were all jammed together in one shrieking, struggling, fainting mass of human flesh. The doors of the Mansion House recently, were hurled bats, caps, bonnets, and coats, the stays and underlines of women, the shoes and heels of babies, and the watches of Chelsea pensioners. Then, at last, the fire was quenched, it was found strewn with the prostrate forms of the dead and the dying. Let it, however, be borne in mind by those who are so impulsively anxious to lay the blame of the late accident at the door of the Lord Chamberlain, that the Chelsea slaughter took place under the eyes of the much-vaunted metropolitan police, and in the presence of a strong military guard. Soldiers and civilians were, however, powerless to do anything to arrest the disorder, simply because one essential precaution had, in the outset, been neglected. Had there been but two doors—two doors—down in an instant by the uncontrollable rush of the crowd; but outside the people had been suffered to congregate in an unresisted mass as they listened. If the very same scene, or nearly so, or string, of intending spectators, not more than two abreast, and extending, if need were, right down the King's Road, Chelsea, into St. James's Park, had been practised on that occasion there would have been nobody trampled to death or suffocated. Why not? How is it that Parisian there horrible pleasure-massacres never take place? Because the police insist on the formation of a queue, and the public willingly acquiesce—for there can be no compromise with Parisian gaminerie.

It was a capital error on the part of the police—both east and west of Temple Bar—to have allowed carriages, whether of the omnibus, vehicles of any description, to be abroad in the principal thoroughfares on the occasion of the late illuminations. In the middle of the thoroughfare, should have been erected along the entire route of the illuminated streets, and then one line of spectators would have flowed tranquilly were, and then peaceably on to the side of it was, blocks, from the number of carriages about, became inevitable; and, crushed between two impassable lines of vehicles, lost their head, and came to grief. The partial outcry that is now being raised against the Lord Chamberlain is unjust, and most irrational, form of abutting the stable-door when the steed is stolen.

It is, however, a very curious sign of the times to remark that while the narrowness of the streets of the City of London, especially those Citywards, are undeniably the cause of nine-tenths of the out-door accidents of which we have to complain, the relief of an overstocked traffic by means of subterranean railways or branches crossing streets is being persistently said, and, it would seem, successfully opposed. Granting some of the new urban railway schemes to be chimerical, some of them at least, if carried out, would be beneficial to the public interest; but the existing Committee of Parliament, and even of the press, appears to be dead against additional intramural means of communication. In a week or two last Monday, pretty nearly all over London, and surveyed a few of the vacant spaces which are to be so zealously guarded from the invasion of railway schemes. We found nobody on the Finsbury-circus beyond a consumptive cat trying hard to commit suicide by the impetuosity of the rush of the railway. We found Leicester-square, cleared from Mr. Wyld's great globe, again ravaging the space of Pall-mall-east, and the spirit of the Prince supper—in the centre. On the other hand, we found at least half-a-dozen other spaces, which, in the very busiest part of the town, were and had been for years, the mangiest of desert places, the resort only of carpet-beaters and their victims.

The inhabitants of Greenwich, or at least the major part of them, seem to have set their hearts upon an underground branch running beneath the park. Some of them have even entertained the idea that action of the trains should disturb the equilibrium of the nicely-poised instruments in the Observatory. Application has, we believe, been to be made for the satisfaction of the Astronomer Royal as to whether a viaduct or a tunnel is likely to be most conducive to the score of vibration. As however, the projected railway will not pass within a thousand yards of the Observatory, we don't think that any more peril is likely to accrue to the instruments than from the traffic on the surface than from the throbbing of the engines on board the steamers in the river, or from the passage of the heavy artillery waggons on the festive occasions.

The lecture season at the Architectural Museum, South Kensington, was inaugurated on Tuesday by a discourse from Mr. A. J. B. Beresford Hope, the president, "On the Condition and Prospects of Architectural Art." The subject was illustrated by diagrams, while by lectures on "Medieval Studies in Palestine," by Mr. G. J. Wigley; "On the Ancient Use of Clay," by Mr. Scott; "On the Origin of Ornament, Old and Now," by Sir Henry Dryden; on "The Wrought-iron Work of the Great Exhibition 1862," by Mr. W. White; on "The Art-Collections at South Kensington," by Mr. J. C. Robinson, F.S.A.; and, finally, on "Architecture, its Purpose and its Place in the Arts," by Mr. Gilbert Scott.

"The pitcher," says the proverb, "goes often to the well, but gets broken at last." Such was the ingenious figure and oft hailed, but last overtaken two notorious "Greeks"—MM. Calzado and Garcia. The first-named worthy, from being a drummer in the Spanish army, rose to be manager of the Opera House in Paris, but was at last torn convicted of complicity in a very scandalous affair of cheating at cards at the house of a Madame Boivin, in the Rue de la Paix, Champs Elysées. Cette dame appartenait à un certain monde: that is to say, the house was a resort of the "upper ten thousand." Calzado, it seems, was a Senor Angel de Miranda, belonging to the household of the Queen of Spain. The game played was "baccarat," compared with which "vingt-et-un" is child's play. The "greeks" were in the secret little cherub who sat up aloft," and found out the knavish tricks that were being put in practice. Calzado and Garcia were tried and the accomplice of M. Calzado was another Hispanic-Greek, named Garcia, a gamester by profession and a native of Cadiz. Both were found guilty, Badon over and over again, but has now, like the pitcher, suffered fracture himself. The Correctional Police have sentenced Calzado to five years' imprisonment, and, moreover, jointly with Garcia, to restore the best part of a sum of 100,000 francs lost by M. de Morsuel; he loved to play, and played to win, and lost, and although doomed to a much longer term of incarceration is said by one of our correspondents to be only "grunting," away by which we presume is meant "punting" on the fortunes of the little Principality of Monaco, where there are public roulette-tables.

The Duke de Grammont-Caderousse, whose bonne bouche of Paris have been convulsed by this monstrous scandal, we in England have just been frightened from our propriety by the confession of the Duke Beaufort, who was once a conveyancer in the Eastern Counties, and who was unfortunate enough to be transported for seven years for a very flagrant act of forgery, had lately the bad taste to get himself presented at the levée held by the Prince of Wales on behalf of her Majesty. His lamentable antecedents were speedily discovered, and the next Gazette punctually contained the announcement that his presentation was cancelled. Somewhat too great a clatter has been made about this untoward little incident, which is, in all respects, an exceptional one, and not in the least likely to occur again. The only thing that required clearing up was as to how the noble Duke was presented, and the ex-convict to the representative of her Majesty had fallen into so inconvenient a mistake. The noble Duke has, however, very promptly come forward and explained that he didn't know who the man was.

OLD TEMPLE BAR.

Among the many thousand spectators who recently witnessed Temple Bar arrayed in its festive decoration few, probably, looked beyond the modern existence of that famous gate of civic history. It is ancient compared with some of the buildings immediately adjoining it; but the Bar itself is scarcely two centuries old. Yet the present generation has witnessed here the ceremony of closing the gates upon the visit of the Sovereign until admission was formally demanded, a custom now dispensed with; we have seen the Bar also shorn of its gloomy grandeur with the drapery of death; we have seen it glittering with emblems of triumph; and but yesterday we beheld it decked with the pastry of the cook and the pageants and the emblems of wedded love. This picturesque commemoration will be found illustrated in another page. How we have to deal with the gate of three centuries since. There is much obscurity in the history of the Bar, which, as a portion of the line of demarcation formerly separated the freedom of the city of London from the liberty of the city of Westminster; or, as Hatton states: "the Bar opens not immediately into the City (that which adjoyned at Holborne), but into the liberty, or Freedome thereof;" "which separation," says Strype, "was anciently by posts, rails, and a chain, such as are now at Holborn, Smithfield, and Whitechapel Bars. Afterwards there was a house of timber erected across the street, with a narrow gateway, and an entry, on the south side of it, under the house. This timber gateway is shown in Hollar's view, engraved by T. H. Shepherd, in the valuable collection of James Holbert Wilson, Esq., of the Inner Temple, barrister-at-law, to whose courtesy we are indebted for permission to copy the same in the accompanying Engraving; as well as the descriptive details from Mr. Wilson's very interesting and carefully-prepared catalogue of his collection, privately printed. The old Bar is also clearly defined in a Birdseye View of London, within a border, inscribed "The Citties of London, Royal and City Arms above; very curious, as showing all the conduits, crosses, and City gates, as they stood at the close of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, 1601; from the late Dr. Wollesley's Collection, and now in that of Mr. Wilson.

OLD TEMPLE BAR, FROM HOLLAR'S SEVEN-SHEET MAP OF LONDON.

For the next hundred years no entry is found in the civic records having reference to Temple Bar; nearly a page, however, has been torn out of the volume, and there are some references to the Bar in the Index, which, owing to the above disgraceful mutilation, are not to be found in the body of the records.

Triumphal arches were raised to welcome James I. to the capital of his newly-acquired kingdom, as well as on the return of his grandson, Charles II., after his banishment from it. Little mention is, however, made of the Timber Gate which stood across the street; and three scourges had visited the nation—civil war, pestilence, and fire—before we again meet in the City records with any mention of the Bar; when, in 1669, the Court of Aldermen and Common Council resolved to rebuild the Bar on receiving from the Commissioners of Streets and Sewers the sum of £1000 towards the cost. It appears that the City had several times been pressed to do this, but had considered the Bar too much detached our colonies which are lying fallow for want of culture? We know that in a small way, and by the benevolent exertions of an individual, emigration of operatives from the north has been promoted. Why should not this be tried on a more extended scale? The best and cheapest hopes of a revival of manufacturing industry do not extend beyond a partial employment of the workpeople for years to come. Are we wait until private charity is exhausted and the machinery of poor-law relief stands as still as that of the cotton-mills before any attempt is made to deal with this great national exigency on a scale commensurate with the variance? If so, let us be sure that, by the process of an inevitable social law, the time will come when the pressure from within will force out of the power of legislative action a solution, and nothing will be left but the rude vindication of the principle of the policeman in the streets and the use of the bayonet law by the truncheon of the policeman in the streets and the use of the bayonet. As yet Man is not a type of the manufacturing districts, but it may be their antitype.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LADY WESTBURY.

The Right Hon. Elizabeth Mary, Lady Westbury, was the eldest daughter of Robert Abraham, Esq., as eminent architect, and was born in 1805, and was married, on the 3rd of November, 1825, to Richard Bethell, Esq., of Rise, in Wadham, Oxford, and now the Right Hon. Sir Richard Bethell, D.C.L., Baron Westbury, of Westbury, Bird Lees, Lord Chancellor of England. Her Ladyship leaves issue three sons and four daughters. Of the latter three are married—viz., the Hon. Eliza, wife of the Rev. Charles Bowyer Adderley, Rural Dean, Rector of Barton Mills, Suffolk, brother of the distinguished Bishop of Wellington, New Zealand; the Hon. Ellen, wife of Captain Christopher D. Carden, 54th Highlanders, of Broomfield, Hunts; and the Hon. Emma, wife of Mansfield Farquhar, Esq., of Woolmersbury Hall, Notts. Lady Westbury died on the 17th inst.

THE BISHOP OF GIBRALTAR.

The Right Rev. George Tomlinson, D.D., Lord Bishop of Gibraltar, was born about the commencement of the present century, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1822, M.A. in 1826, and D.D. in 1841. He was, after taking holy orders, for some years Chaplain of St. Matthew's Chapel, Spring-gardens, Westminster. He was nominated in 1842 to the newly-founded bishopric of Gibraltar, and was the first Bishop of that See. Dr. Tomlinson was for some time secretary to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The Very Rev. Perkin Lee Tomlinson, the eldest daughter of General the Hon. Sir Patrick Stuart, G.C.M.G., and grandson of Admiral Tomlinson, tenth Baron Torphichen, died at Gibraltar on 4th September, 1859. He married, secondly, in 1855, Miss Fraser, daughter of Colonel Claude Fraser, of Castle Fraser, in the county of Ross, which lady died in 1858.

ADMIRAL WYVILL.

Christopher Wyvill, Rear-Admiral of the Red, whose death recently occurred at the Grange, Beulah, Yorkshire, was a scion of the ancient and knightly family of Wyvill, of Constable Burton, in the county of York, created Baronets in 1611. He was the second son of the Rev. Christopher Wyvill, by his first wife, Elizabeth, sister of the Marmaduke Wyvill, Esq., of Constable Burton, and to the present Marmaduke Wyvill, Esq., of Constable Burton, formerly M.P. for York. He was born in 1788, and entered the Royal Navy in 1801, as an boat with the Tribune; and, after serving in the Channel for five years, continued actively employed in the Mediterranean, as convoy of thirty-one vessels laden with stores for Russia's army at Sevlja, and several gun-boat and fire service, and was present at the bombardment of Genoa by batteries, on the coast of Naples. At the same year he also obtained the command of the boats of the squadron at the blockade of Corfu, and after other daring acts of service in the taking of two strong batteries and eighteen mail near Marsaglia, he was appointed to the command of an official vessel. In 1807 he passed a catastrophe which, but for his timely aid and courage, would have caused the destruction of the vessel in the Bay of Naples, between the ship Immortalité, at Carabina. He became a Rear-Admiral of the Red in 1856.

VICE-ADMIRAL PHILLOTT.

Vice-Admiral Charles George Rodney Phillott, who died on the 11th inst, at Hampstead, aged eighty, entered the Royal Navy in 1794, and was present at the reduction of the Cape of Good Hope in 1795, and captain of the Dutch sloops-of-war Amphion Bay, 1795. He was made a Lieutenant, July 1, 1801; and assisted in the Amphion ship at the capture of the Spanish treasure-frigates off Cape St. Mary, in October, 1804. Returning to the Mediterranean, Lieutenant Phillott took part in an action with a flotilla of gun-boats off Algesiras; and was present at the landing of troops at Maida in 1806, previous to the battle of Maida. His conduct in the Amphion at the attack on the French store-ship Batavier at Rose Bay, and subsequently up the Seine in 1807 for his promotion in January, 1810, to the rank of Commander, after which he was employed on the service of the Transport Board in charge of the convoy's troops, in the course of which service he was wounded in five places, and compelled to submit to amputation. The Prince-regent subsequently, in consideration of his unfortunate encounter with the Marlborough, Government packet, maintained him on half-pay for six months. He obtained the retired post rank in December, 1818; and became a Vice-Admiral in 1837.

In a recent number of this Journal, when noticing the death of Colonel Sir Gel Hargrave, we omitted to mention that he had commanded the Grenadier Guards for some years.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Mrs. Charlotte Marlborough, of Cedar Cottage, Streatham, Surrey, relict of Edward Marlborough, Esq., was proved in London, under £30,000. The testatrix, after giving a few trifling legacies, her will in October, 1861, and has left legacies to several charitable institutions; but the bulk of her property she leaves to her niece, Miss Ellen Elizabeth Swinnow, Esq., appointing the latter sole executor. To her said niece, Mrs. Swinnow, the testatrix bequeathes her residuary estate, and also her stock of the furniture, and also the residue of the property, for her own absolute use. There are also funds to several of her other relatives and to several private friends; also a legacy of £400 to her nurse, and £200 to another servant. The following are the charitable bequests:—£500 and the residue of her property to the Gospel among the Jews, £200; Baptist Missionary Society, £200; Baptist Bible Translation Society and Baptist Irish Society, each £100; Bible Association, £200; Aged Pilgrims' Society, £100; Asylum for Fatherless Children, Reedham, £100; and the Mariner's Orphan Asylum, £100, all free of legacy duty. The legacies to charities and to servants to be paid free of legacy duty.

The will of the Hon. Benjamin Collins Brodie Hart., D.C.L., F.R.S., F.R.G.S., of Broome Park, Betchworth, near Reigate, Surrey, was proved in the Prerogative Court on the 11th inst. The sons and executors, Sir Benjamin Collins Brodie, Bart., and the Rev. William Hart Brodie, M.A., accompany were sworn under £30,000 personal estate. The testator's son, George Waldegrave and R. H. Vaughan, Esq. Sir Benjamin attained to the dignity of baronetcy in the 23rd October last. The testator was a distinguished contributor to the distinguished appointment of Serjeant-Surgeon to her Majesty the Queen Victoria; vice president of the Royal Society; president of the General Council of Medical Education, and a corresponding member of the Institute of France. He was born in London on the 9th of October, 1861, and two cordials in August and September last. To his son, now Sir Benjamin Collins Brodie, Bart., F.R.S., and to his sons-in-law, the Rev. and Honble. Frederick Stuart, he, on failure thereof, should the same descend to any of the testator's family except his daughters. The testator's "Memoirs and Letters of Brodie" is to be used, by Royal license, with his family arms. To his eldest son he also leaves his gold medal at New Garnon. His estate is exempted from the payment of an annuity of £100, bequeathed by the testator to his niece, Blanche, for the term of her twenty-first year, and he has left to his wife for life into three equal parts: one-third to his son; one-third to his son Benjamin; and the remaining third to his daughters, Mrs. Stuart Brodie. The testator further bequeaths to his son William a legacy of £2500, and to his daughter, Mrs. Brodie, £500, appointing the latter executrix and residuary legatee.

The will of the Venerable Charles Thorp, D.D., F.R.S., Archdeacon of Durham, was proved in London on the 4th inst., the personalty being sworn under £40,000. The archdeacon died on the 19th of last month, at his residence, Thorp, Vicar of Billingham; together with W. Dickson, Esq., Q.C., Recorder of the Sessions for the county of Northumberland, and Mr. Wheler and son are the acting executors. This venerable dignitary had nearly reached his eighty-first year, and was the oldest of the Archdeacons and Canons of Durham. He was appointed, in 1829, Warden of the Durham University and Master of the Grammar School, and held the living of Billingham and died at the latter place in October last. Dr. Thorp executed his will in February, 1860. His lands and property at Billingham are settled, and cannot be bequeathed by his will for sale, and after her decease to his son; and leaves his estate of Chipwell Hill in trust for his daughter. He directs Newton-on-the-Moor to be sold, and his daughter for their respective lives; then to his son. He also bequeathes to his wife an annuity of £100, payable out of the general estate, and an immediate legacy of £100; likewise, plate, linen, pictures, and sundries effects; and the way select plate, pictures, and sundries, to the amount of £600. The Doctor bequeaths to each of his daughters who have not received marriage portions sums varying in amount from £3000 to £4000, to be held in trust; leaving to each daughter £500, with permission to select plate, books, and furniture to a certain amount. Legacies are bequeathed to his sister, nieces, and cousins. Legacies are also left to the doctor's servants. The residue of his property, real and personal, he leaves to his only son, the Rev. Charles Thorp. His seven cartoons of Raphael, now in the museum at Durham, he directs to be offered to that University for the sum of £500; if refused, then to the Dean and Chapter; and, if not accepted by them, they are then to merge into the residue of his personal estate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. S. B. Reston.—The games are interesting, and shall not be forgotten. The solution is correct.

A. B. C.—Of the eighteen enchantments who entered for the Morphy Memorial Tournament, only two have sent in their solutions of the play, among the others, we reserve with the termination of the competition.

M. H. of Peckham.—Both your solutions are wrong; but we have not space to show why.

CHESTER, ARMAGH, W. KERSHAW, ALPHA, ARCHIMEDES, ANONYMOUS.—Correct.

L. Lewis.—Solution received. In No. 305 would certainly not be difficult if it were solvable in the manner you suggest; but it is not, as you will see find on re-examining the diagram.

R. B., Wyhelm.—It has long been obsolete. It never was in the novel.

J. C. M., Bath.—Your solution of No. 304 is correct. Mr. Wilson makes his two more moves—Kt. to K 7th to C 6th (ch), and Q. to K 7th, and mates in two more.

CHESSYAL.—We have not yet received the first solution of Mr. Willmore' fine problem.

J. Wilson, Leeds.—Both problems are correct. All solutions of problems must be sent, accurately, with, 1. K to Q B 4th (ch), or 1. K to K B 7th (ch).

J. Wilson.—Your solution is correct, and your problem is very pretty, than the last one work.

No. 1197.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1863. TWO SHEETS, FIVEPENCE

CONGRESS TO ENFORCE THE RIGHTS OF POLAND.

A FEW hours before Parliament adjourned for the Easter holidays, Lord Palmerston, in reply to an inquiry put to him by Mr. Heneessy, announced in somewhat general terms that England and France had agreed upon a course of diplomatic action in reference to the affairs of Poland, and that he believed the papers which he hoped to lay before both Houses soon after Easter would satisfy the country as to the steps which the Government had taken on behalf of that unhappy nation. We suppose there can be but little room to doubt the authenticity of the information given to the British public in the Times of the same date, to the effect that, "both as members of the community of nations, the civilisation of which has been outraged by the tyranny of the Russian Government, and as parties to the Treaty of Vienna, the chief States of Europe have felt themselves compelled to consider their relations with Poland, and to take counsel as to the best means of removing a great scandal and a danger to the peace of the world." The noble Premier, it is true, did not, in words, corroborate this announcement, but neither did he deny its accuracy; so that, piecing together the authoritative language of the Times on Friday morning and the more reticent phrases of Lord Palmerston on Friday night, we are tolerably safe in concluding that England and France are unitedly seeking a congress of those European Powers whose representatives signed the Treaty of 1815, to which Russia will be invited that she may at once explain her own case, and accept or reject the decision of Europe.

We can well understand why the leading Governments of Europe should entertain objections to the assembling of a general congress, and should discourage a resort to the moral coercion which this kind of international machinery may bring to bear upon States supposed to be chargeable with the offence of misruling their own subjects. Each is desirous, as a matter of course, of preserving intact its own sovereign rights, and is therefore cautious of trespassing upon those of others. But the relations of Russia and Poland are so peculiar, the title of the other Powers of Europe to deal with them is a matter of such express treaty stipulation, and the peace of the world would be so endangered by a continued refusal to act upon that title, that general objections are overborne by the pressure of the particular case, and it has become safer to employ an irresistible diplomatic action for the protection of the Poles than to be governed in this instance by the modern and generally-accepted principle of non-intervention. The truth is, that Poland has never yet surrendered her rightful claim to be considered an independent nation. The partition of the old kingdom of Poland in 1772 by Russia, Austria, and Prussia was a crime which the conscience of Europe has never condoned; and the earliest provisions of the Treaty of Vienna in 1815 prove that all the parties to that great international instrument, Russia included, formally recognised the right of the Poles, under whatever sovereignty, to retain inviolate the nationality of their kingdom.

We accept Lord Palmerston's interpretation of the treaty as the true one. It is a public engagement in which the several subscribing Powers pledge themselves to each other in relation to the distribution amongst them of political authority, an engagement which gives a European sanction to all the stipulations it contains, which entitles each Power to use the whole force at its command, should it be so advised, to enforce upon any of the other Powers an observance of its provisions, but which does not bind any of them to draw upon its own resources, or to risk its own well-being in the attempt to give effect to the common agreement. We are under no treaty obligation to preserve to Poland the rights which that instrument solemnly recognised as hers; we are not even morally bound to go to war in her behalf, should our own circumstances render such a course inexpedient. But the case has now assumed an aspect which renders it a simple matter of prudence, as well as a duty owing to humanity, for the subscribing Powers to interpose, and with one voice demand that the recordered will of Europe shall no longer be set at nought, and that Russia shall fulfil the engagements into which she has entered. Probably they will deem it essential to their logical consistency, as well as to their practical success, to leave untouched the original partition; but they are entitled to require that Russia shall give to the new Kingdom of Poland, as it was defined in 1815, a Constitution consisting of a Senate and a Representative Chamber (to be summoned for deliberation at least once in every two years), a separate Polish Ministry, independent Judges, a national army, and a free press. These are rights which Europe insured to Poland by the Treaty of Vienna—rights which Russia engaged to respect—rights which she has wantonly annulled—rights which we hope the combined Powers will authoritatively call upon her to restore.

We have assumed that the mode in which diplomatic action will be brought to bear upon the Government of the Czar will be by Congress. The decision has not been so announced, but we are given to understand that the Czar will be invited "to renew at some convenient place and time the deliberations commenced nearly fifty years ago." To this course, back with an invitation would, no doubt, have been scornfully declined. But the Russia of Alexander II. and of 1863 is not the Russia of Nicholas and of 1853. She is in no position to defy Europe Her strength was drained out of her by the Crimean War. Her internal cohesion has been put to a severe strain by the emancipation of the serfs. Her most enlightened classes are watching for an opportunity to gain for their country some of the political as well as social benefits of western civilisation. The cruel treatment of Poland is disapproved of by large numbers of influential Russians. The idea is gaining ground even at St. Petersburg and Moscow that a Russian nation, as contradistinguished from a Russian empire, would be secure of growth, development, freedom, and refinement, while an agglomeration of nations and races, it is almost hopeless for her to expect. Nor is it to be lost sight of that Poland, insufficiently armed, harassed by troops, and bereft of her first Dictator, is yet competent to carry on the struggle with her gigantic foe with such variations of local success as cannot fail of inspiring unconcern. The defeat and retirement of Langiewicz, the moral effect of which was expected in this country to be most disastrous, have occasioned but a comparatively slight sensation in Poland, and the provisional Government at Warsaw has assumed its activity. The insurrection still makes head. The contagion extends. The demands of the Poles, instead of becoming shrivelled, as they would have done if despair had seized the hearts of the people, are gradually widening. The concessions which the pride of the Czar would refuse to insurgents, the numerous and brave of the empire may make him glad to yield to a European Congress; and perhaps the longest-sighted of his statesmen suspect already that Russia has more reason than Poland to accept with secret joy the interposition of foreign States.

Although we heard Lord Palmerston's statement and read the article in the Times with unfeigned satisfaction, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that England and France have taken upon them a very delicate and, probably, a very thankless responsibility. Austria, for example, who has substantially discharged her own treaty obligations in regard to the part of Poland which is subject to her rule, and who has the strongest interest in intercalating between her own frontier and that of Russia a sturdy, warlike, independent kingdom, cannot but discern at a glance that the case of Russia, in relation to Poland, is but faithful a duplicate of her own case of advice in relation to Hungary. Prussia has entangled herself beforehand too deeply in the policy of the Czar to welcome any project of European intervention in favour of the Poles. No doubt the very great majority of the people of the West, acting in friendly conjunction, and backed, as they would probably be, by Sweden, Denmark, Spain, and Portugal, will carry into the Congress immense influence. But the circumstances of Europe scarcely warrant the expectation that all will be smooth sailing; nor can it be confidently asserted that the result will not be a compromise disappointing to the friends of the Polish cause. We question whether the insurgent leaders view the action of diplomacy with lively or sanguine hopes. They believe themselves able to wrest their national independence from Russia; they aim at more than any Congress is likely to award them; and they seem fully convinced that, whatever concessions may be made to them on parchment, they will be ultimately driven to make them good by their own right hand. Perhaps they are right. At any rate, they are in no humour to suspend action while awaiting the movements of diplomacy. The final decisions of the Congress, if it should be got together, will probably be mainly governed by the attitude which Poland herself is able to maintain, and the ultimate effect of European intervention will very probably be the shortening of an inevitable and deadly struggle, and guaranteeing it from proving altogether barren of wished-for results.

The general Conference of the Sovereigns at Munich has commenced its sittings. The commissioners of all the States have arrived in that capital, with the exception of the one from the free city of Frankfort, which will be represented by the commissioner of Nassau until the 8th, when the other will arrive.

A letter from Stuttgardt, in the Cologne Gazette, says :—"In the night of the 21st ult. a fire broke out in a house adjoining to our Zoological Gardens. It was a horrible spectacle to see the fury of the animals, terrified by the sight of the fire and by the extreme heat caused by it. Nothing could exceed the rage of the ferocious inmates of the garden, particularly those of the lions and the bears, and, in order to calm them, the keepers were obliged to be constantly furnishing said water on them. The military rendered necessary the enforcement of riderous to fire on the animals in case it should be found impossible to save them. Fortunately, that extremity was not found necessary."

FRANCE.

The Empress, Princess Clothilde, and Princess Mathilde, were present at the Academy on Thursday week, to witness the reception of the new member, M. Octave Feuillet, the eminent dramatist.

M. Magne has tendered his resignation, which has been accepted by the Emperor, and his successor, appointed him, is Member of the Privy Council. The following is the text of the Emperor's letter to M. Magne :—

"My dear M. Magne,—An incident, the responsibility of which does not rest with you, has rendered more apparent the difference of opinion which exists between M. Fould and yourself on several financial questions. Under these circumstances you have considered yourself bound to tender your resignation. In unreservedly accepting it, I must say, I wish it to be known that I have never had but to congratulate myself on your zeal and devotion. I have, therefore, reserved to you a sitting place in the Council, whenever the meetings of the Privy Council. I hope that you will never entertain any doubt of the sincerity of my sentiments."

There have been rumours that M. Fould had tendered his resignation, and that it had been refused. The resignation was tendered, it is asserted, in consequence of a Government communication to some of the Paris journals, stating that three journals had gone too far in exciting M. Fould's financial hostility at the expense of the financial policy and results of preceding years. M. Fould conceived this to be casting a slight upon his policy.

A Bill has been presented to the Legislative Body opening to the Minister of State a credit of 345,000f. for the expenses of the Exhibition of 1863. The bill stipulates, as in former cases, that the receipts of every kind accruing from the prices of admission, catalogues, &c., shall be paid into the Treasury.

The coming elections, likely to take place about the middle of June, excite much interest. M. Havin, in a rather pompous manifesto, published in the Siècle, announces that he will present himself for the district represented by M. Picard, whom the Minister of the Interior would, it is said, prefer not to see returned. It is added that he came forward "under the patronage of his political friends and the writers in his paper"—in other words, that he was the candidate of the Siècle. M. Havin has, however, been obliged to submit to the indignation of the Liberal party. He will leave M. Picard's circumscription alone, it is said, and will, in all probability, present himself in one of the other districts. On this condition M. de Girardin offers M. Havin the right hand of fellowship and fervent support for his candidature.

On Wednesday next a grand dinner will be given by Lord Cowley in honour of the Duke of Malakoff.

The Emperor has decided on the construction of a railway from Lyon to the Swiss frontier, Italy, uniting itself to the network of the Italian lines.

The races at Vincennes on Sunday proved a great success. The Emperor and Empress were present, but the absence of the Duc d'Aumale Baraguay St. Antoine honoured the meeting with their attendance. The concourse of visitors was immense, and the sport more or less in "Derby-Day" character than any other of the French races. Some curious "events" there were, Napoleon, however, carried the "swells." The "great unwashed" were represented by upwards of 70,000 men, women, and children, who had apparently never witnessed a race in their lives. The police were wholly unable to keep them within their omnet, and, but for the great good nature which is characteristic of a French crowd, a fearful loss of life would undoubtedly have been the result. The younger portion of the crowd, not fancying that the walls and barriers were placed in the course meant to be jumped over by the horses, clambered upon them, and it required no little exertion and persuasion to dislodge them.

The following are the names, by order of promotion, of eighteen Marshals of France, under the first Empire, who are to give their names to the streets, squares, and bridges of Paris now being transformed and embellished :—Marshals Moncey, Duc de Conégliano; Masséna, Duc de Rivoli; Augereau, Duc de Castiglione; Bernadotte, Duc de Ponte-Corvo; Soult, Duc de Dalmatia; Brune, Lefebvre, Duc de Trévise; Ney, Duc d'Elchingen; Davoust, Duc d'Auerstadt; Lannes, Duc de Montebello; Victor, Duc de Belluno; Mortier, Duc de Reggio; Macdonald, Duc de Tarente; Jourdan; Kellermann, Duc de Valmy; Lefebvre, Sénatorial Count of the Empire, and Count Servurier. The thirteenth Marshal of the Empire, Marmont, Duc de Raguse, has not been comprised in the list, on account of his conduct during the days of struggle before the restored Bourbons.

The Moniteur announces that the Annamite insurrection has been suppressed, and that all resistance in Cochin-China has ceased in Cochin-China.

The health of the King is in a much more satisfactory condition, and on Sunday his Majesty was able to give audience to Baron de Savigny, the new Minister of Prussia to the Belgian Court.

PORTUGAL.

The Government has been defeated in the Chamber of Deputies. A dissolution or a change of the Ministry is expected.

Universal sympathy is expressed with Poland.

ITALY.

Yesterday week the new Minister of Foreign Affairs, Signor Visconti Venosta, made his first appearance in the Italian Parliament. It was a special sitting of the Chamber, and the subject under discussion was the petitions which had been presented to the Chamber on the Polish question. The new Minister made a speech on this occasion that was attentively listened to, and received with encouraging applause. He spoke of the sentiments which the Italian Government, the representative of Italy at St. Petersburg, who is to recommend the Czar in a friendly manner to ameliorate the condition of Poland. He spoke also of the negotiations in progress between France and England with the view to a joint intervention in favour of Poland. As to the policy of the Italian Government, he expressed it in these words :—"Always independent, never isolated." The debate was renewed on the following day, when the recommendation of the Ministry with which the petitions should be referred to the Government, and expressing a confidence that the Ministry would do all that was possible in favour of Poland, was adopted by a large majority.

One is Maria Clotilde, sister of Berlaida, sister of King Louis XVI. of France, who died in 1802; the other is Maria Christina, daughter of the King of Sardinia, consort of the King of Naples and mother of Francis II. : she died in 1836.

AUSTRIA.

There has been a Ministerial crisis at Vienna, occasioned by difference of opinion with regard to the Hungarian question. It is announced, however, that the crisis is over, and that Baron Schmerling and Count Rechberg are now quite agreed upon the line of policy to be followed, the Judex Curiæ for Hungary, has tendered his resignation; and Count Esterhazy, Hungarian Minister without portfolio, will probably also resign; while Count Forgach, the Hungarian Aulic Chancellor, remains in office.

We hear from Vienna that at a conference between Count Rechberg and the French and English Ambassadors it has been agreed to address an identical note to the Russian Government, recommending the speedy introduction into Poland of reasonable reforms.

At a Council of the Ministers it has been decided at once to convoke the Transylvanian Diet.

Five newspapers have been confiscated in Pesth for publishing a letter by Baron Eotvos, and a reply by M. Deak, containing an attack upon the present Constitution of Austria.

PRUSSIA.

DEBATE ON THE POLISH QUESTION.

On Tuesday, in the Chamber of Deputies, a debate took place on the Polish question. Herr von Bismarck-Schönhausen repelled the double expressed relative to the accuracy of his former statements. He repeated that all statements contrary to his own, which had been made by foreign Governments or Ministers, were based on error. Foreign Ministers, he said, had frequently acknowledged that they had not been correctly informed on the subject. The Minister continued :—"The Polish question was not originated by the convention, but has existed since 1830. It has repeatedly exercised a great influence on Prussian interests. The Government has nothing to add to its former declarations in reference to the existence and contents of the convention. Agents of the Polish revolution have sent telegrams from Cracow to the French papers, in order to influence the Public."

Herr Waldeck stated that the Government had merely yielded to the pressure of foreign Governments.

Herr von Bismarck-Schönhausen replied that this assertion had not the least foundation, and that the Government had not yielded at all.

Herr von Sybel considered that the Government had shown great hesitation, such as might be felt by one who, engaged in an unsuccessful enterprise, has the greatest stepping from beneath his feet. Herr von Sybel added—"All Europe was then in error, if we are to believe Herr von Bismarck-Schönhausen. But, considering the declarations of the French and English Ministers, enough remains of the convention to make Europe uneasy, and to compromise Prussia."

Herr von Bismarck-Schönhausen replied that he did not know the existence of certain arrangements with Russia, and that he had never denied this. Certain articles of the Vienna Treaty were not, however, he said, known to the public. The Minister continued :—"One will be surprised at the step, after all the false statements in reference to the convention, to learn what are its real contents. It is positively false that, according to the convention, the Russians are allowed to pursue the fugitives on Prussian territory, and that they meet with a number of Prussian soldiers sufficient to disarm the insurgents."

Several members then recalled the first declarations made by the Ministers of the Western Powers and the communications of the Prussian Ambassadors on this subject.

Herr von Bismarck said that the Western Powers had been sufficiently enlightened respecting the contents of the suppositions they had formed at that time. He defended the Prussian Ambassadors in Paris and London, and intimated that they had been misunderstood.

The Polish members then asked what the Government intended to do with the refugees from Russian Poland who had been sent into the interior?

Count Rulenberg stated, in reply, that the intentions of the Government were based, generally, in the majority of cases, especially with reference to those persons who had been drawn into the movement against their will, on humanity. On the other hand, the Government was obliged to fulfil the obligations it had contracted with Russia.

CONVENTIONS WITH BELGIUM.

In Tuesday's sitting of the Chamber of Deputies Herr von Bismarck said before the House three conventions concluded with Belgium on the 29th ult.

The conventions comprise a navigation treaty, an agreement with reference to literary and artistic copyright, and a protocol declaring the adhesion of Prussia in principle to the redemption of the Scheldt dues, on condition of being placed by Belgium upon the same footing as England.

Herr von Bismarck pointed out that these conventions marked further progress in the direction entered upon by the French commercial treaty. He also stated that Prussia had promised to cooperate in procuring the redemption of the Scheldt dues for a certain maximum.

DENMARK.

THE SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN QUESTION.

The great political question at Copenhagen, the preparations for which we announced last week, took place yesterday week. It was most numerous and influential. The following three resolutions were proposed and unanimously adopted :—

1. The claim of the German Federal Diet to final decision in all cases where the representatives of Holstein agree with the Danish representatives or the representatives of the Danish provinces, is at variance with Holstein, and is undoubtedly a breach of the treaties by which the Danish Government, based on Federal authority, renders it impossible that a common Constitution for all parts of Denmark (the contemplated agreement between Holstein and Schleswig Denmark) should be established without endangering the independence of the Danish Crown and monarchy.

2. The unimpaired maintenance of Constitutional unity between Denmark and Schleswig, which, based on common history, common sufferings, is a right possessed by the independent Danish parts of the monarchy. The establishment of this unity would, however, by no means be more complete Government, in a condition of the safety of the Crown and the welfare of the people, while the extension of provincial institutions would lead to a disintegration of the empire. The regulation of the internal affairs of Schleswig and the kingdom of Denmark is a matter to be arranged between the King and the subjects of both countries, and does not concern foreign Powers.

3. The maintenance of the independence and Constitutional liberty of the Danish empire demands the carrying out of the principle, regardless of political parties, already laid down in the Constitution—viz., that the existing unity in internal affairs and in the Administration should cease between the Danish provinces and Holstein simultaneously with the abolition of the common Constitution; the States of Holstein having refused to pass resolutions with regard to measures for the continuance of the public welfare renders it requisite that in the next Rigsraad (the Legislature for Denmark and Schleswig) emergency laws should be passed to carry out this principle.

An amendment for the immediate complete fusion of Schleswig with Denmark, proposed by a native of Schleswig, was rejected by the meeting as inopportune.

Expressions of sympathy with Poland from several speakers were received with immense applause.

Acknowledgments of the general policy of the Swedish Government encountered a similarly enthusiastic reception.

Remarks disapproving Earl Russell's despatches upon the Schleswig question were made by some of the speakers.

GREECE.

The National Assembly has unanimously proclaimed Constitutional King of the Greeks Prince William George, second son of Prince Christian of Denmark, and brother of the Princess of Wales and the Czarina. A "Te Deum" was celebrated, which was followed by public rejoicings, illumination, and serenades. A deputation of forty members, chosen by the Ministry, will proceed to Copenhagen to offer him the crown in the name of the Greek nation.

England, Russia, and France approve of the Prince's candidature.

TURKEY.

The intended voyage of the Sultan to Egypt has been postponed.

Arrangements are being made for the payment of the dividends on the Turkish Consolidés in London and Paris.

Three commissioners have been appointed to make a tour of inspection in the provinces.

The Paris and Vienna journals publish despatches affirming that there have been fresh collisions between the Christians and Mohammedans in Syria, that two Christians have been assassinated at Damascus, that some of the Druses have attacked a detachment of Turkish troops, and that the European Consuls have demanded the adoption of precautions against the possible occurrence of fresh massacres.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the steamer City of Baltimore we have telegrams from New York to the 20th ult.

WAR NEWS.

The main fighting during the week under review has been in the neighbourhood of Fort Hudson. We have as yet received only the Federal accounts. According to them the bombardment of Port Hudson commenced at two o'clock on the 14th ult. At twelve o'clock p.m. the Federals attempted to pass the batteries under cover of the darkness. One gun-boat passed in a damaged condition. The Federal sloop-of-war Mississippi was burnt to the water's edge in front of the batteries. Another large vessel was completely riddled, a third badly crippled, and the rest driven back. Thirty-six of the crew of the Mississippi were captured. Admiral Farragut's flag-ship went down the river disabled.

On the Yazoo River the Federal gun-boats captured twenty-six gun-boats, destroyed a number of others.

The works on the Vicksburg Canal had come to naught. The Mississippi broke through the levee and filled the trench with water and rubbish, thus rendering it useless.

The inundations in Mississippi and Louisiana caused by the cutting of the levees on the Red River and Lake Providence covered a great extent of country. In Louisiana a region covering 6000 square miles has been converted into a lake.

The Confederates have fortified the approaches to Galveston, Texas, with the guns captured from the Federal steamer Harriet Lane and Westfield. Three batteries are erected on the island where the city stands, and two on the opposite side of the entrance to the port. The is planted, and Pelican Island is fortified with eight guns.

Federal fleet of Galveston consists of the steam-frigate Brooklyn and four gun-boats. The fleet approaches to within a mile and a half of the town, where the vessels anchor and occasionally throw shell into the town and forts; but they cannot bring their broadsides to bear, and have to operate exclusively with their rifled pivot-guns. The Brooklyn's fire set the town in flames at three different places, but the danger was soon subdued. The Brooklyn was greatly damaged. The crew on board began to send shot from their 15-inch rifled guns, one of which cut the rigging. The Harriet Lane is up the river some seventy miles, where she is undergoing repairs.

The steamers Britannia, Gertrude, and Havelock have arrived safely at Confederate ports.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Legislature of New Jersey has passed a series of peace resolutions by a vote in the Assembly of 38 against 13. These resolutions protest against the war as unconstitutional, and declare that compromise or for the subjugation of States with a view to their reduction to a territorial condition against the domination of fanaticism and the abolition States not in insurrection; against arbitrary arrests and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; against the admission of Western Virginia against the Constitution proclaimed; against the expenditure of public money for the benefit of the negro race. The Legislature declares that the appointment of peace commissioners to meet commissioners from the insurgent States to consider if any plan may be adopted, consistent with the honour and dignity of the National Government, by which the present civil war may be brought to a close, is not inconsistent with the honour and dignity of the Federal Government, but as an indication of the spirit which animates the adhering States would, in any event, tend to strengthen America in the opinion of other nations. The resolutions were sent as a message to the Federal Government and to the Governors and Legislatures of the other States, requesting them to give the subject immediate attention.

Mr. Seward has given a State dinner to the Haytian Minister at Washington, at which the British, Russian, French, and Prussian Ministers were present.

Mr. Cyrus Field has addressed a large meeting at the New York Produce and Cotton Exchange upon the subject of the Atlantic cable. Resolutions declaring confidence in the success of the undertaking, and appointing committees to raise the remaining capital necessary, were unanimously passed.

It is reported that the rumour of a foreign loan of 100,000,000 dollars having been authorised by the Secretary of the Treasury was false.

A preliminary meeting of Poles has been held in New York, and an address to the National Committee of Poland drawn up. A committee was also appointed to arrange for a grand demonstration in the Cooper Institute.

CALIFORNIA.

On the 15th ult. the fast schooner Chapman, when leaving San Francisco for Mexico, was boarded by the Government officials and taken in charge as a privateer. The schooner was subsequently captured on board, well armed, and six brass Dahlgren guns with carriages and shot on board. The prisoners consisted of the full complement of men were to be taken aboard at a rendezvous down the coast.

CANADA.

Dele ations from the merchants of Oswego, New York, and Toledo, Ohio, have had interviews with the Canadian Government to procure a modification of the rate of tolls on the Welland Canal. The result of the interviews is not known.

A serious affray took place at Sarnia, on the night of the 14th ult. between the whites and negroes. The whites organised a force, marched to the negroes, ordered the blacks away, destroyed their property, and burned their house. The negroes fled to the woods.

THE INSURRECTION IN RUSSIAN POLAND.

There is not the slightest sign of the insurrection being "played out." On the contrary, various circumstances denote the reverse. Both in Plock and Augustowo the insurgents have contrived to obtain a consignment of 1000 musket rifles. A telegram from Cracow, of the 28th, states that fresh bodies of insurgents which had been collected in the palatinate of Sandomir have joined the corps of General Czachowski in the mountains of St. Croix. They commence by evacuating the palatinate adjoining Cracow, and are being concentrated in the palatinate of Lublin, where the insurgents are increasing. A body of 1000 insurgents, which was reorganised in the mountains of St. Croix, has appeared in the vicinity of Kielce, and the Russian troops are now marching thither.

Whether the departure of Langiewicz from the scene of action was in consequence of the tactical difficulties which have been pointed out, or has been agreed upon by the very numerous reports which come from Poland. A paragraph in a paying proclamation, however, from which the empire's dimensions in camp as the chief cause, Langiewicz says—"The Russian agents hiding themselves in your ranks make it necessary for me to depart secretly, and without bidding you farewell. The same reason also prevents my informing you of my ultimate destination. Calumny denounces me as an easy triumph for the foe. The adherents of the ambitious criminal I have to thank for all this are not among you. You are aware, utterly ignorant as you are, that my object is to establish the liberty and independence of the country." The "ambitious criminal" is Mieroslawski. The real reason of parting with Langiewicz was illustrated by some documents summarised in our last week's Number.

All the insurgents who have fallen into the hands of the Austrians have been sent into the interior to be imprisoned in the fortresses. Amongst these is Langiewicz's brother-in-law, Zaleski.

Concession, now that defeat has in some measure overtaken the insurgents, is reported to have been recognised not only by foreign Governments, but also by the Archbishop of Warsaw, Monsignor Felinski. He has, in a letter to the Emperor, maintains that the only means of pacifying Poland is to unite it to Russia, and thus convince with the existing kingdom into a Polish kingdom under the Russian Crown. This is done submission is made, and peace restored, or the country will be devastated."

An Imperial ordinance has been issued at St. Petersburg appointing General Count Berg, in the place of General Somnorskow, as Adjutant of the Grand Duke Constantine in the chief command at the army of Poland. The same ordinance also appoints General Lewschine Chief of the Police of Warsaw.

It is thought by the Times' special correspondent that the acts of cruelty attributed to the insurgents by many of the Russian journals are founded on the severity of the wounds caused by the scythe. The Poles have cut off the noses, ears, and fingers of numbers of Russians. They have also cut off their arms and heads; but all this has been done with the sharp scythes of the Kossainzi in fair fight.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams have been received through Mr. Reuter's office :—

THE FUTURE POSITION OF HOLSTEIN.

COPENHAGEN, April 2.—Last night a most important proclamation of the King was published, refer ing to the separation of Holstein from its connection with the entire Monarchy. The introduction to the document says :—

The proclamation of the King of the 28th of January, 1852, stated his Majesty's determination to combine the different portions of the Monarchy by means of a common constitution into one single well-regulated State. This determination was the result of the conviction that the welfare of the united affairs of the Monarchy, and set up demands not founded upon Federal laws and inconsistent with the independence of the Danish crown, and the rights of those portions of the country not belonging to the Confederation. The Estates of Holstein, however, have persistently opposed measures which might have led to an agreement, and have declared themselves hostile to any common constitution. Under these circumstances there is such a state of internal discord, by which the development of the kingdom has been paralysed that it is impossible to maintain longer the present relations. The unsatisfactory results of the last Assembly of the Holstein Diet, we deem it our duty to declare that we shall not convoke any more. We reserve to us consider most in conformity with our Federal duties. For the present no other measures are taken than those which are necessary for the future developments for a future period. By this present proclamation, therefore, the Assembly is declared an independent army. For the future we shall treat there with the rest of the Monarchy the civil list, the appanages, the public debt, the navy, the provisions for foreign affairs, the administration of the domains, the customs, and the postal arrangements; but even in reference to these matters we shall not enter into any treaty with the Holstein Assembly for further separation where no agreement between the Holstein Estates and the Royal Government can be arrived at. The Assembly is therefore dissolved by this present ordinance.

His Majesty further ordains that the Ministry shall submit to the Holstein Estates bills establishing constitutional regulations for the general concerns of the Monarchy, and especially for the affairs of the press, the right of petition and of association, and of religious freedom. The proclamation calls together the 22nd Rigsraad (Legislative Assembly for Denmark Proper) for the 22nd inst.

AMERICA.—New York, March 21, Evening (per Anglo-Saxon).—General Sumner is dead. An armed party of inhabitants have succeeded in rescuing several deserters from the military guardhouse at Wheeling, Virginia. Indiana troops were sent from Indianopolis, and they were recaptured.

CHINA AND JAPAN.—Shanghai, Feb. 22.—The late General Staveley and the British forces have suffered a severe defeat in the storming of Taiiun. The casualties among the united forces amounted to 60, four officers being killed and wounded. Advices received by Japan announce that the British fortification at Yeddo had been destroyed by gunpowder by the Japanese. No fatal accident, however, occurred. All the country was unsettled.

AUSTRALIA.—Melbourne, Feb. 23.—Dissatisfaction prevails in the Colony of Victoria in consequence of England's new monetary system. The total amount of gold shipped since the departure of the last mail amounts to 99,975 ounces. Intelligence received here from Sydney announces the total wreck of H.M.S. Orpheus on Manukau Bar. Commodore Burnel and Commander Burton together with 138 men, officers, and crew were drowned.

The Ordnance Survey of England and Wales is finished, and the maps will be issued in the course of a few weeks. It has been almost eight years in progress, and has been completed at a cost of £900,000.

The expenses attending the installation of Prince Louis of Hesse and the Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz as Knights of the Garter amounted to £784 6s. 6d.

The Queen has given orders for the appointment of Lieutenant-Colonel Arthur Purves Phayre, of the Bengal Staff Corps, Chief Commissioner of Assam, to be a Companion of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath.

Mr. A. J. Symington, author of "Pen and Pencil Sketches of Tarn and Teviot," has recently been made a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries of Copenhagen, of which the King of Denmark is President.

Private advices received by the Journal of Commerce state that thirteen vessels have left Shanghai for Liverpool with full cargoes of cotton.

A grand banquet in honour of Prince Czartoryski was given at Stockholm yesterday week. General Hastfer proposed the toast "To Poland's health," which was drunk with the greatest enthusiasm. Polish national hymns were sung by the assembly.

The distress consequent upon the cotton famine has been felt in the city of Lublin, where the municipal authorities have taken the steps taken for their relief, a charitable merchant of Malta has placed £100 in the disposal of the Governor of the city. The money is intended to make forter contributions when the above sum is expended.

A letter from Portsmouth says, that the sloop-of-war Vulcan, commissioners the loss of the ship India, which was engaged in carrying troops and stores from Queenstown to Bombay, struck on a rock on the way to the shrine of Mecca. The ship went ashore in the Malacca Straits, and but for the opportune assistance of the Vulcan, it is feared that the whole of the passengers, with the ship's crew, would have perished.

The Queen has appointed the Right Rev. William Walrond Jackson, D.D., late Bishop of Nelson, in New Zealand, to be Bishop in Council of the Island of Antigua. Her Majesty has also appointed James Paul Ryan, Esq., to be a member of the Legislative Council of the Island of Joseph Goodman, Esq., to be a member of the Legislative Council of the island of St. Lucia; Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Keate, to be a member of the Legislative Council of the Bahama Islands; and Copeland James Stamers, Esq., to be a member of the Legislative Council of the island of Dominica.

Lord Elgin's great durbar at Agra, on the 17th ult., is described as magnificent. The Governor-General and his suite received at chiefs from Rajpootana and Central India filed the grand tent, with costumes surpassing in richness any scene was a perfect blaze of jewels to other spot in the world could display. Most remarkable of all there, though not so high in rank as many, was the Maharajah of Jeypore, whose saddle-cloth, bridle in cloth of gold and an enormous headpiece of the same costly fabric, the figure of Brahma in front. The durbar was fatigued to spectators in 1857. She wore the insignia of the Star of India, and purple silk gloves.

A ball has been given by the non-commissioned officers of the Royal Artillery at the Royal Barracks, Woolwich, in honour of the new of architecture, and is perfectly unique. The ceiling is supported by large pillars of ice, which are surmounted by Corinthian capitals, from which are four smaller rooms—three used as dressing-rooms and one as a refreshment-room—all built of ice, and presenting productions of the same material as all the success that could be desired. Dancing was kept up until twelve o'clock on the most approved principles, and when the last set of quadrilles and waltzes were pressed, and all arrived at the same conclusion, that the ball exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the gallant host.

Some young gentlemen, part of whom belonged to the diplomatic corps, with the assistance of the Prince of Orange, gave a ball at the Hague, on the 19th ult., in honour of New Year's Day. The Queen, the Prince Henry, Prince Frederic, and Princess Mary, his daughter. Towards midnight, an immense cake was brought in, which, when cut, was found to be right to a gauze hanging which encircled the whole ballroom, and in a moment the flames spread over the hall. Many of the ladies fainted, others, in the presence of mind, commanded calmness and silence; and, thanks to this the Prince remained until the fire was extinguished, which was not effected till the expiration of the time required to consume the cake, which completely destroyed.

Admiral Tegethoff, commander of the Federal Upper Mississippi squadron, describes a singular trick he recently played the Confederates. Returning to Cairo, on New Year's day, he ran down the river, and passed the blockade by the Queen of the West and the Indianola, five of the guns in the forts of Vicksburg and Warrenton opening upon him. Admiral Porter tried to make the enemy fire as much as possible. Finding that they could not be prevented by the Queen of the West and Indianola, he ran down the Mississippi Monitor. Etiquen saved the country with an iron sea—why could I not save it with fire? I had on board the Queen of the West 1000 lbs. of gunpowder, which I put in the river, was the foundation to build on. It was built of old boats and twelve hundred bales of cotton put on the top of each other for smoke-stacks, and two old canons for quarter-boats; her furnaces were built of mud, and only intended to make black smoke and not steam. Without knowing that Brown was in peril, I let loose our Monitor. When it was observed by the light of the morn, never did the batteries of Vicksburg open with such a din; the earth fairly trembled, and the shot flew thick around the devoted Monitor. But she ran safely past all the batteries, though under fire for an hour, and drifted down to the lower mouth of the canal. She was a much better vessel than I had ever supposed. Brown, on the Queen of the West, they opened on her again with all the guns they could bring to bear, without hurting her. Brown kept on his course, and when he got out of reach of the water, though going in at one side and out at another. She was already full of water. The soldiers of our army shouted and laughed like mad."

THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT BRIGHTON.

In accordance with arrangements made between the authorities at Brighton and the metropolitan commanding officers, and which have been sanctioned by the War Department, it is decided that the great volunteer review on Easter Monday shall take place in front of the Race Stand on White Hawk Down; and it is anticipated that the movements will be, in a military sense, of a far more comprehensive character than those which were performed last year. The chief command of the volunteer force on the review, by direction of the War Office, will be intrusted to Lord William Paulet, aided by a staff consisting of Generals of Division, two Adjutant-Generals, and eight Brigade-Majors, all connected with the regular Army. The railway authorities adhere to their decision of last year—viz., that volunteers in uniform under arms to and from any station to Brighton and Hove, in the vicinity of one mile from the said stations, and officers of as first-class passengers, at 5s. 6d., return tickets, with the privilege of having special tickets to go down on Monday and return by any train on the Tuesday. Officers or artillery officers are to be conveyed there and back for a charge of 1s. The London and Brighton Company have extended the privilege, permitting officers travelling with their men to do so at the same fare—viz., 1s. 6d. The railway authorities have arranged that the trains shall commence to leave Brighton at 6.40 p.m., and continue running alternately to London Bridge and Victoria stations at the following rate of six trains per hour. The arrangements at Brighton are being carried out under the direction of the Corporation and the trustees of the Queen's Promenade, the same as those of last year. Sir J. V. Shelley, Colonel of the 6th Middlesex (London and Westminster) Rifles, has arrived here for Brighton and made the requisite arrangements.

Last Saturday afternoon nearly all the metropolitan corps were busily engaged till dark in rehearsing the movements which will probably have to be executed, though it is hoped, unopposed, on the field. The intended evolutions will be generally known until the entire force is on the ground. The City of London Rifle Brigade marched up the Guildhall in strong force, and marched to Regent's Park, where, in conjunction with the Queen's Westminster Rifles (Hyde Park Barracks), they were put through a variety of intricate movements by their respective commanding officers, Lieutenant-Colonel Wyatt and Lieutenant-Colonel Bethune. The Victoria Rifles mustered at Knightsbridge Barracks, and marched to Hyde Park, where the movements of the day were gone through. The 1st Middlesex Artillery, and 1st Middlesex Engineers, the former at head-quarters in Leicester-square and the latter at Kensington, were also assembled, and performed their respective marching officers, as did also the 22nd Middlesex (Queen's Westminster) in Westminster, the following previously mentioned corps in Hyde Park. The London Scottish marched out from Adelphi terrace in strong force, accompanied by the Highland light infantry company, 22nd regt. The 13th (North-West Middlesex), under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Riggs, assembled in the grounds of the Regent's Barracks, Albany-street, Regent's Park, and performed battalion movements till dusk. There was a numerous attendance of all ranks.

SALMON.—A return under this head, issued on Monday, shows the value of British salmon exported from the United Kingdom for the year ending December, 1862; naming the ports from which the same was exported. The value of the exports was £19,212. Edinburgh, £1,502; Aberdeen, £1,932; Greenwich, £33; Cork Quay, £109; Bristol, £20; Liverpool, £4077; Leith, £26; Southampton, £33; and Queenstown, £21,178 ; in all, £27,194 ; the total exports of salmon to this or otherwise, to which the general description of "provisions" may have been included, the entries at the Custom-house at that season are not classified.

In our article on the "Dannebrog," in the Number of the 21st ult., it was stated that the supposed miraculous gift of the national flag of Denmark was a subject of controversy among the Danish historians. A Danish correspondent, anxious to remove from his country the stigma of civil strife, desires us to insert the following statement:—"The Dannebrog (Danish) Denmark was, he writes, entirely Christian. King Waldemar II., however, not having gained the victory over the Estonians against the Mohammedans thought it incumbent upon him to originate one of his own, and accordingly he said with a great host to the Estonians. It is true that a connection exists between the Danes and the Pagan Esthlanders at Weimer, near Revel, that the Dannebrog was given to the Danes, and that of this battle Eschland exclusively to Denmark, by which country it was held until the middle of the fourteenth century.

A Koenigsberg letter in the Cologne Gazette says :—"A law-suit of some interest on the subject of the copyright in a piece of music has just been brought before the tribunals of this city. The music composed by Meyerbeer for the coronation festival was taken down from ear by a lady, who had it arranged for the piano and lithographed. A publisher at Leipsic, named Schlesinger, who had purchased the copyright of the march from M. Meyerbeer, has brought an action against the publisher here, and considers who had copied and printed the pianoforte arrangement. This tribunal would not, however, admit that taking down a work on a musical instrument constituted an infringement on a publisher's rights, and gave a verdict in favour of the defendant.

Sixty-five of the head men of Coorg, India, have presented a petition to the Government, in which they confess that six years ago they were so ignorant as to dislike a school established among them; but it has done so much good, been so well conducted, that "if the Rajah and the European settlers make the education of their children appear so necessary," that they have raised £2000 towards a permanent fund for the school, and that they ask the State for £1100 more, which Lord Elgin has gladly promised. A pleasanter appetite is hard to find, and a garden better to sit in. Wisdom Sir. Bowring, the commissioner, observes that such an instance as this of a whole race going of its own impulses, and mainly at its own cost, to the earnest wish of their rulers to educate themselves, has probably never before occurred in our history.

WOODS, FORESTS, AND LAND REVENUES.—The audited accounts of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests for the year ending June 30, 1862, have been issued. The receipts on account of the land revenue during the year were £441,719, as compared with £441,719 in the year 1861, and £441,954 for Crown rents, profits of mines, &c., £4000 of temporalities, Windsor Forest and Park, £2000; and Hampton Court Park, £1000. Royal forests and woods. The total of £441,719 was expended as follows—£29,504 as expenses for repairs, improvements, and charges of management, £27,138 as expenses of Windsor Forest and Parks; and £32,454 for the Royal forests and woodlands. The sum of £230,000 was paid over to the Exchequer as surplus revenue, being a balance for next account of £31,704. The salaries in the office of Woods and Forests are not taken into account under the above expenses, being carried for by an annual vote, which for the year in question was £28,703; making £58,807 as the total expenses of management. The net land revenue of £413,264 is available for salaries. The sum actually spent was £58,166, leaving a balance of £8098, which the auditor considers to be unexpended. The salaries, as well as some other small balances on other votes for the Woods and Forests, are

"A LABOUR OF LOVE." FROM AN ENGRAVING AFTER A PICTURE BY T. F. DICKSEE.

The original steel engraving, which we have produced on wood, is one of the works of art contributed by members of the Council of the Art-Union of London. The steel plate is by Messrs. H. C. Shenton and C. H. Jeens, and is creditable to the engravers for its careful fidelity to Mr. Dicksee's picture, and for its skilful execution. In our reproduction of this plate we aim at aiding the diffusion of a knowledge of the merits of a work of art favorable from a picture, and also at offering a suitable recognition of the many years' honorary labours of the council and management of the Art-Union of London.

We have painted a many similar scenes. All like ourselves, we trust we may be permitted to add) working ardently and hopefully to diminish man's taste for art by cultivating his love for it. Such is the conclusion of them, within the reach of all, and thus to extend to the utmost the refining and ennobling influences which art owns to bring to bear on our hearts and homes. This is indeed "a labour of love," and much fruit can be shown for it. Nearly twenty years, though, ago, it needed to say, it is a less laborious employment and more uphill work than that which engages our pretty, laughing Welsh lassie. Coming to us upon this homely, but pleasant task, we are encouraged to believe that all such congratulatory reflections are, however, fairly driven out of our minds. So is the young gallop by! We have a delightful sympathy for those who might be toiling along the rugged paths, over the rough moorland, or down beside the rocky and boulder-strewn channels of the mountain cases of "wild Wales." As for that little urchin, he or she has to be screaming with delight at his pick-a-back ride as plainly as that the girl is laughing outright at her "labour of love." The dog, too, a determined to have his fair share of the fun, and it is difficult to say which of the three is the most delighted, although the physiognomists will insist that dogs have no risible muscles. Pray, Sir Charles Bell, do not dogs laugh with their tails? We think Sir Edwin Landseer would affirm that they do. Be that as it may with their faces and tails for best, bare feet take our Atalanta out of our sight, down to her humble home, yonder—the cabin we may have passed unnoticed in the hollow—let us take another glance at that frank, laughing face, for it is a pleasant thing to remember in a city, and we shall hardly find the like at theatre or ball. Also let us here say we quite agree with the artist that such a figure and costume—unkempt hair, streaming in the wind, blowsy jacket, tucked up, or shaken, let us say, "fashioned" skirt; and (by no)means to be forgotten) the pretty-coloured though ragged petticoat, and bare feet, form a very great deal, more picturesque than the prismest retoun and the most fashionable robes et demi-robes of the Queen herself.

Returning to the more prosaic part of our labour (intending, henentente, no offence to Mr. Tennyson), we have to add that the subscribers to the Art-Union of London will also receive for this year's subscription a set of designs in outline illustrative of the "Idylls of the King." Of these we cannot speak highly; but it must be remembered that this is an extremely trying walk of art, and one in which scarcely one living British painter, with the marked exception of Mr. Maclise, has won any reputation. And then, any of the past publications of the society, whether sculpture or engraving, may be substituted for this set or the plate we have engraved. There are, of course, in addition, the chances of a prize entitling to the selection of a work (of the value of the prize drawn) from our public exhibitions. In lieu, however, of all the prizes being, as heretofore, of this character, the first prize this year is to be the well-known life-size marble statue, by Mr. Marshall, R.A., "The Dancing Girl Reposing," valued at £700. This choice of a prize by the society, instead of by the subscriber, is a partial adoption of the plan which seems to have worked well in the case of the Art-Union of Glasgow.

We should not be true to ourselves if we concluded without saying that there is to all existing art-unions a bad side to watch, as well as a good side to develop. They have unquestionably tended to foster a good deal of trickery and trivial trading mediocrity, and to keep many artists from aspiring to anything higher and better. On the other hand, they have helped at the right moment rising men to fame and bread, they have helped at the right moment rising men to fame and bread, they have diffused a vast amount of fortune; and, as we have said, they have diffused a vast amount of innocent enjoyment, and, doubtless, some improvement; for the connoisseur, as well as the artist, must "walk before he can run"—say, for example, as swiftly as our pretty Welsh lassie.

"VENDREDI SAINT" (GOOD FRIDAY), BY PAUL DELAROCHE.

"GOOD FRIDAY." PAINTED BY DELAROCHE.

TIME was when art ministered solely to religion. In its ingenuous youth and its most vigorous maturity art was the faithful servant of the Church. Still its crowning glory is won in the same unworldly service. But the power of conveying religious sentiment on canvas has become as rare as it is precious. For three centuries small, very small, has been the proportion of painters who have sought or distinguished themselves in this "narrow path." Two French artists—Paul Delaroche and Ary Scheffer—are among the few, the very few, eminent religious painters of modern times; nor were even these painters exclusively of sacred subjects. If, however, the former had never painted any others, three small pictures exhibited in the galleries of our International Exhibition, though not, perhaps, noticed so generally as they deserve, would be quite sufficient to rank Paul Delaroche among the great masters of any age. Almost the last, they are decidedly the most remarkable works of this extraordinarily-gifted painter.

All three of these marvellously-suggestive and profoundly-pathetic works represent incidents relating to the Crucifixion of our Lord which are supposed to transpire within a few hours of each other; but we have contented ourselves with engraving the one bearing the title "Vendredi Saint" (Good Friday), as an appropriate commemoration of that holy day and solemn fast which we yesterday set apart to recall the most momentous and touching memories of our common faith.

The painter, by force of his imagination and art, introduces us into the dwelling of "the beloved Apostle," where the disciples, the three Marys, and "holy women," are supposed to have collected in terror at the arrest of Christ. And here, in the dim earliest dawn, the great Light goes from them, they fear for ever, in the faint morning light, which seems, morally, only to make "darkness visible"—here, in direst dread and dismay, they are made aware of that fearful "procession to Calvary," so hopeless, so inexplicable; for is such to be the end of Guido and Master, Son and Saviour, Prophet, Priest, and King? Here, from witnessing the mock trial and hearing the ruthless sentence, is John, who, ever faithful, will soon receive from the lips of the dying Redeemer the sacred charge of the Mother of our Lord, now in agony at his side. Here is Peter, after the denial so bitterly wept over and so nobly to be redeemed. The same impulsive manhood, the same human mingled strength and weakness which possessed him when he smote off the ear of the High Priest's servant, now forces him to the window, a look from which may be death, and almost urges him again to open defiance and resistance. Here, in unutterable anguish, is the kneeling, heart-broken Mother of Sorrows; here the prostrate, loving Magdalene, her dishevelled hair still scented, doubtless, with the odour of the costly ointment wiped from the feet of the Saviour—the "anointing for the day of the burial." The painter needed not to tell us of what passes beneath that window. Even from the various inclination and confusion of the dread instruments of death, the sponge, the superscription, the staves, we can easily imagine the tumultuous passage of the brutalised Roman soldiers; the still fiercer and more implacable Jewish leaders; the shouting, yelling, and fiendishly exultant mob; "one Simon of Cyrene" bearing a cross, and behind, the archetype of torture and shame, goaded on by blows and curses, spit upon and reviled, fainting, the Son of Man, love Divine, incarnate, crowned with thorns, wailed from the scourging, covered with the bloody sweat of the Garden. We have taken our Engraving from a beautiful plate published by M. Goupil, of Paris.

In the companion subjects to this intensely pathetic conception we see first the same figures at night, when all is over and the seal set upon the tomb of their hope and love, returning with just sufficient strength to struggle, faltering and fainting, to the threshold of the future home of the Mother of Christ. And then, still later, we see all, exhausted by agonised watching, asleep in this poor dwelling—all but Mary, the Mother, who stands, her features writhing, in the dim light of a lamp lost in contemplation of a blood-stained crown of thorns, the only memento of her lost Son and Saviour.

The most noticeable technical quality in these remarkable pictures is the appropriate and impressive negation of colour and degradation of tone without sacrifice of any essential detail, a quality very rarely found in English paintings.

It has occurred to us that a few biographical notes of this eminent painter may not be unacceptable, and we therefore venture to give the following:—

Hippolyte, dit "Paul," Delaroche was born in Paris, in 1797. He at first studied landscape, and was, in 1817, an unsuccessful candidate for the prize in landscape painting of the Ecole des Beaux Arts. The next year, abandoning landscape altogether, he entered the studio of Baron Gros, under whose guidance he made rapid progress. At this time the great contest—extending to art, literature, and manners—had commenced between romanticism and classicism. Gros had already thrown off the trammels of David and his school, and it was not long before the young Delaroche emancipated himself still more completely. He never went, however, like Delacroix, to the opposite extreme. While seeking dramatic action and picturesque effect he did not lose a certain classic dignity and sobriety, or sacrifice form and correct drawing. Hence, when he became an acknowledged chief in art, his school was called eclectic, as borrowing from the romantic school of Delacroix, and the classic school of Ingres. He was chiefly distinguished from the classic school by never choosing subjects from antiquity or mythology.

It was not till 1824 that Delaroche exhibited works (from French history) which made a marked impression. Two years later appeared the first of his remarkable pictures from English history—"The Death of Queen Elizabeth," now in the Luxembourg. The vigour of this work is beyond question; but we leave to historians to decide the propriety of the unflattering continental idea of the character and personal appearance of our "Good Queen Bess" (?) embodied by Delaroche. Some years later followed his "Children of Edward IV. in the Tower." But the work of unquestionably highest merit from English history is "Cromwell contemplating the Corpse of Charles I." now in the Ellesmere Collection. This, like the three religious subjects, jects, one of which we have engraved, belong to those episodes of the parable and probable history to which the imaginative art of the painter has given immortal interest. His other most important works from English history are "The Execution of Lady Jane Grey;" "Charles I., in the Guardroom, Insulted by the Parliamentary Soldiers" (in the collection of the Earl of Ellesmere), and "Cromwell Strutford on his way to the Scaffold receiving the Blessing of Archbishop Laud" (now in the Sutherland Collection).

In 1835 the French Government intrusted him to paint the pictures for the Madeleine, and he went to Italy to make studies from the great masters of fresco. But hearing that Flandrin was commissioned to execute works for the same church, and fearing a consequent want of unity, he declined the task. Accordingly, he afterwards was charged to decorate the hemicycle of the Palais des Beaux Arts. Upon this, his greatest work, he spent four years. The "Hemicycle," as the painting itself is termed, represents the great painters, sculptors, and architects, from the earliest times to the present, assembled round it in wera, in groups. In the centre, Apelles, Phidias, and Ictinus are enthroned as representatives of the painting, sculpture, and architecture of ancient Greece. To right and left of these are placed, symbolical of eras in the subsequent history of art, sculptors, architects, and painters. Some of the artists introduced are still alive; those omitted, indicate a narrow, exclusive, French, and, apparently, ignorant estimate of the most illustrious names in the history of art. But, apart from this, the work is one of the noblest examples of mural painting of modern times. Before the throne are four female figures, personifications of the arts of Greece, Rome, the Middle Ages, and the Renaissance. The painter's wife, the only daughter of the late Horace Vernet, and the lady to whom the late Leopold-Robert said to have destroyed himself, is understood to have served as the model for the Renaissance. Phidias, on the throne-ground, quite close to the spectator, an almost nude female figure holds crowns of laurel, one of which she seems in the act of throwing into the hall. The appropriateness of the whole composition will be more readily understood when it is remembered that in this hall the prizes are given to the successful competitors at the Ecole des Beaux Arts.

Among the painter's numerous subjects and portraits from French history may be named—"Une Scène de la St. Barthélemy," "La Cardinal de Richelieu sur le Rhône, conduisant à la Supplice Cinq Mars et De Thou," and a companion, "Le Cardinal Mazarin mourant," "La Mort du Duc de Guise," one of his best pictures; "La Reine Marie Antoinette, après sa Condamnation à Mort;" "Napoléon at Fontainebleau," and "Napoleon Crossing the Alps." Nearly all the works we have named are well known from admirable engravings. Delaroche was named a Member of the Institute in 1832, subsequently Professor at the Ecole des Beaux Arts, and created an officer of the Legion of Honour in 1834. He did not contribute to the Exposition Universelle, at Paris, in 1855. He died in 1856. A collection of 130 of his pictures and drawings was exhibited at the Palais des Beaux Arts in 1857.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1863.

Many of our readers would gladly seize for a holiday the interval of a few days between long spells of arduous and responsible work, the man to whom the great interests of England are committed makes a journey of 800 miles, and delivers a series of elaborate speeches, any one of which would set up an ordinary orator for a twelvemonth. The Lord Rector of Glasgow, for such is now the last addition to the numerous titles borne by the Premier of England, has not only been giving a new proof of the admirable working order in which he keeps both mind and body, thereby completely demolishing the pernicious theories of certain of his enemies that non est qualis cras, but has been doing his work at Glasgow in a style which has not been equalled for its practical merits by the efforts of any of his distinguished predecessors. Lord Palmerston has never made any pretension to the title of orator, and, indeed, he has all his life been too busy with results to be particularly anxious about obtaining them with a flourish, and, provided that he gained the verdict, he did not care much about the spectators being affected to tears or the jury being visibly agitated with emotion over the matters of his commercial care very much indeed. He has ever aimed at carrying his points rather than at making his speeches specimens of eloquence. We especially recollect that in the case of the great address of June, 1850, a few days only after the memorable night of the Don Pacifico debate, Lord Palmerston held the House's attention for five hours while he defended the foreign policy he had pursued in almost every part of the world, there were neither epigrams nor bursts of passion, but a strong and closely-knit chain of argument, which duly gave him the triumph on the following Friday, but which has remained, in its essence at least, in the minds of all Englishmen ever since, and has left in them an abiding conviction that the Premier perfectly comprehends his business. So with these gigantic tasks Scotland, and especially with the Premier's address to the students. Flowers of oratory there are none, and, save a few happy phrases, remarkable chiefly because they are terse and English, there will be little for the professed student of speaking to hear away in his memory; although that student has really appreciated the reasons of the success of Lord Palmerston, the lesson will be more valuable than a note-book full of brilliancies would be. Indeed, his Lordship disclaimed any idea of teaching in a showy fashion; and, in a preface addressed to the contents, gifts and graces of Lord Brougham, intimated that it was to Gamalichs of that kind that the young Scotch Sauls must go for their rhetoric. But how sound, and how good, and how cheerful in its manliness was the inaugural address! How it struck at the root of the matter—told the youths that learning, like everything else, was to be honoured for what it was worth; and that, though the operation of acquiring wisdom was in itself beneficial in the highest degree, they were to think of wisdom as the means to an end, as a help through life, and as a qualification for getting on well. Learn everything you can, he said, and do not be afraid of being called smatterers. Every one must be a smatterer in ninety-nine things out of a hundred; but every little thing learned may come in usefully at some time or another. We make no doubt that we shall read some excessively bighminded criticism upon the practical teaching of the Premier, and we shall find German critics especially pointing with indignation to the matter-of-fact lesson he taught, contrasting it with the lofty, cloudy talk of Teutonic philosophers, and asking what must be the nature of a people whose foremost man can tell the rising youth of the nation nothing better than that if they are wise and sensible men they will get on in the world;—the which and the taunt we must endeavour to bear.

The reception which Lord Palmerston has met with in Scotland must be as gratifying to himself as it is honourable to those who gave it him. The tribute is to the politician and the patriot. Lord Palmerston has no ties connecting him with the north; and, though he spent some sixty years ago, a few months in study at Edinburgh, that is too remote and shadowy an association to be an element in the present welcome. The Scotch were eager to show their respect for and confidence in a man whose character is the surest guarantee for that of Conservatism; who is too much a man of the world to let the country get into any scrapes through haste, over-sensitiveness, or awkward diplomacy; but who is at the same time a man of too much English spirit to allow her to be placed in a false position, or to suffer the evening self-assertion of others. When speaking at Greenock he was within sound of the hammers in the yard in which the Black Prince was built, and his hearers were quick to perceive the point of the allusion to the position the men to appreciate his words in the event of the country—that we would seek no quarrel, would avoid one if possible, but that we were very ready indeed should any one try to fasten a quarrel upon us. This progress of Lord Palmerston, made when he is all but eighty years of age, is a feat in every sense of the word. It is a proof that, though old, he is not effete; it is a bold stroke upon the chord of sound sense and true feelings, which never responded more worthily to a master's touch than it has just done in Scotland at the biddin~ of Lord Palmerston.

THE COURT.

The Queen continues in good health at Windsor Castle.

The Prince and Princess of Wales took leave of her Majesty on Saturday, and left the castle for Sandringham Hall, Norfolk.

Her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Alice, Duchess of Kent, Princess Helena, Princess Louise, and Prince Leopold, with the Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting, attended Divine service in the private chapel. The Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell preached.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by her Royal Highness Princess Louise of Denmark, the Lieutenant-Colonel Hon. D. De Ros, Equerry in Waiting, attended on horseback. In the afternoon her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Alice, walked in the grounds. The Earl and Countess of Derby arrived on a visit. Earl Russell arrived at the castle, and had an audience of her Majesty, at which Senator Antonio Gonzalez, Spanish Minister; Count Wachsmeister, Minister Plenipotentiary from Sweden and Norway; Count Brassier de Saint-Simon (Counsellor Privé); Persian Minister; M. J. Sanz, Peruvian Minister; and Mr. F. E. Dubois, Minister Resident from Hayti, had audiences of her Majesty.

On Tuesday her Majesty, accompanied by the Prince of Hesse, Princess Helena, Princess Louise, and the members of the Household, proceeded to the Windsor railway station by the private drive through the Home Park shortly before seven o'clock, and visited the Royal Victoria Hotel, Windsor, a saloon, which has been magnificently furnished for the special accommodation of the Royal family. The Prince of Hesse and the Major-General Commanding Sir Fenwick Williams of Kars, C.B., were in attendance.

At ten minutes past seven the Prince, with his suite, and the Princess Helena, Princess Louise, and Princess Alice, took their departure from the platform on the private and most affectionately embraced him.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales left Windsor Castle on Saturday for Sandringham Hall, Norfolk. Their Royal Highnesses travelled to London by the Great Western Railway, and thence by the Eastern Counties line into Norfolk. Their Royal Highnesses were received at the Shoreditch station by the chairman of the railway and the general manager of the company. The train started at a quarter past one o'clock, and, stopping at Bishops Stortford, and Audley End, reached Elsenham, where grand demonstrations were made, their Royal Highnesses arrived at Lynn at four o'clock. Loyal addresses were presented at Great Yarmouth and Lynn, which place the train passed rapidly on to Wolverton, where the Prince and Princess arrived at twenty minutes past seven o'clock, and where their Royal Highnesses proceeded by road to Sandringham, everywhere greeted with the most hearty enthusiasm.

The Prince and Princess attended Divine service in the parish church on Sunday last.

PRINCE ALFRED.

His Royal Highness Prince Alfred arrived at Dover on Tuesday, from Ostend, and proceeded to London. Captain Arrowsmith, the Prince's Equerry in Waiting, William steam-packet, Commander Sir Luke Smithett. His Royal Highness partook of luncheon at the Lord Warden Hotel, and afterwards proceeded by special train direct to Windsor Castle. The Prince, although looking thin, was in excellent spirits, and in much better health than could have been expected after his recent illness. His Royal Highness appears to have grown nearly as tall as the Prince of Wales.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary, attended by Lady Geraldine Somerset and Captain P. Cust, returned to their residence at Cambridge House on Saturday, from visiting the Duke of Rutland at Belvoir Castle.

The Duchess of Inverness, who has been confined to her apartments at Kensington Palace by indisposition, is much better.

The Duke and Duchess of Argyll have left their villa at Campden-hill, for Inverary, Scotland.

Earl and Countess Russell and Lady Georgiana Russell and family left town on Saturday for Pembroke Lodge, Richmond Park, for the Easter recess.

Earl Granville left town on Saturday for Kimbolton Castle, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Manchester.

The Earl of Fife left town on Monday for Edinburgh. The Countess is detained in town by indisposition.

Viscount Palmerston left London on Saturday for Glasgow. The noble Viscountess is passing the recess at St. Leonard's-on-Sea.

Sir Robert Peel left town on Saturday for Paris on his way to Geneva, where Lady Emily was daily expected to arrive from Nice.

The Right Hon. B. Disraeli and Mrs. Disraeli have left Grosvenor-gate for Hughenden Manor for the holidays.

A marriage is arranged to take place between Lady Jane Hay, daughter of the Marquis and Marchioness of Tweeddale, and elder of the Duchess of Wellington and Lady Emily Peel, and Colonel Richard C. H. Taylor, C.B. (late of the 79th Highlanders), Assistant Adjutant-General at Shorncliffe.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

A movement is on foot to raise a memorial window to the late Archdeacon Hare in Hurstmonceaux Church, his former parish.

The Bishop of Rochester held a confirmation at Rochester Cathedral yesterday week, when upwards of 300 persons were confirmed.

The Bishop of Lichfield has appointed Confirmations to be held after Easter Sunday for a week or ten days. His Lordship will not, therefore, hold his usual levée at London House, St. James's-square, on Tuesday, or on Tuesday, April 14.

Lord Ebury has placed a notice on the Order-book of the House of Lords that after the recess he would move that, where the population amounts to 10,000, it ought to be augmented to £200 a year.

The Bishop of London has appointed the following preachers in St. Paul's Cathedral for this month:—The Dean of St. Paul's will preach on the morning of Easter Sunday, April 5, and on the 19th; Rev. H. Melvill, Rev. J. Lupton; 26, the Rev. C. Marshall.

There is to be an appeal in the case of the "Essays and Reviews" after all. When Dr. Lushington delivered his judgment, notice of appeal was given; but, as the time allowed for prosecuting it had elapsed without any step being taken, it was suspected that the matter had been given up. On Tuesday, however, application was made to Dr. Lushington to allow the appeal to proceed, notwithstanding the lapse of time; and the learned Judge granted the application.

All Saints' Church, Hatcott, Bucks, was reopened on the 22nd ult., after a complete restoration by Mr. G. E. Street, the diocesan architect. The total cost of the restoration is nearly £700, and has been provided for by voluntary subscription.

The Bishop of Oxford has addressed his clergy on the subject of the Colenso heresy. He refers to the request lately addressed to him from the Episcopal Bench requesting him to resign his functions; and adds that, as he has not thought proper to comply with that request, it becomes a duty to prohibit him from administering the Word or the sacraments within the diocese of Oxford, and to take such further steps as circumstances may require. He describes the Bishop of Natal's speculations as rash and feeble, and declares they would have no weight were it not for the office of their author.

TESTIMONIALS.—A silver inkstand has been presented, with a suitable address, to the Ven. Archdeacon Browne by the students of King's College, on the occasion of his entering the professorship of ecclesiastical history, which he has held for twenty-eight years. The congregation of Bunsbury Church, Cumberwell, have presented a handsome testimonial to the Rev. Henry B.D., who has been recently appointed by Dr. Rowland Williams, Vice-Principal of Lampeter. The Rev. Mr. Hall, who resigned quite recently the Rev. G. W. Lewis of Aberdovey, has been presented with a handsome testimonial, consisting of a written testimonial resigning the curacy of Great Dunmow, Essex, and a purse containing £60 in gold, a pocket handkerchief, and a silver snuff-box, the latter containing £20 in gold, a pocket communion-service, and a very handsome quarto Bible, from the parishioners.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS.—In a Convocation held at Oxford on Wednesday, at the Clarendon Press, Mr. Jowett, Master of Balliol, was re-elected University Preacher for the year. On the 23rd of April the Bursars of Colleges will be in the Guardians. At a meeting of Masters of the poor were elected. Four of the old Delegates' room, eight of the new, and a vacancy to be filled up. Mr. Heath's place board were re-elected. Mr. Heath, Mr. Wall, of Oriel, the Rev. J. A. Cramond, M.A., of Brasenose, the Rev. J. J. Lias, M.A., of Jesus, and Mr. J. R. Bloxam, M.A., of Magdalen. At a Convocation held on Saturday (the last day of Term), after re-election of Mr. Jowett as Preacher, Mr. Gaisford, son of Sir Thomas Gaisford, D.C.L., her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to the Court of Spain.

At Cambridge, the Vice-Chancellor has appointed D. T. Ansted, M.A., Professor of Geology, in succession to Professor Sedgwick. Mr. Ansted is also Reader Lecturer for the ensuing year. A grace has passed for adopting Mr. Scott's plan for enlarging the University Library. A grace also passed to accept Miss Shuckburgh's donation to the Observatory. This university having recently had raised a new professorship of St. John's College for the purpose of founding a prize, to be called the Adamsian Prize, for the best essay on some subject of pure mathematics, astronomy, or other branch of natural philosophy, the prize to be given once in two years, and to be open to competition for all persons who have at any time been admitted to a degree in this university, the maximum age limit for the candidates in the subject for the prize to be adjudged in 1863:—"A systematic account of the phenomena and laws of terrestrial magnetism, so far as they have as they have been hitherto ascertained by experiments." It is desired that a precise description be given of the instruments employed in the experiments which are made, and of the mode in which the laws have been deduced by a discussion of the experimental results. The use of mathematical formulæ in the discussion and electro-magnetism should be included. The essays must be sent in to the Vice-Chancellor on or before the 31st of December. Each essay to have some motto prefixed, and to be accompanied by a paper, sealed up, with the same motto on the outside, containing the name and address of the author giving the candidate's name and college written within. The papers containing the names of those whose essays are not successful will be destroyed unopened. Any candidate is at liberty to send in his essay printed or lithographed. The successful candidate will receive £130 for his prize. The author of the best essay at his own expense, and to present a copy to the University library, to the library of St. John's College, and to each of the four examiners.

The past week was a busy one at Eton, and the colleagues of Dr. Saturday for the Easter holidays. Among the visitors, the desire of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, who, indeed, took their way to Sandringham immediately after their visit on their arrival at Eton, might illustration of the interesting character of the ceremonies on the 1st, which will have an extra week's holiday. This, however, is not the case with the 2nd, which is added to the usual holidays at the end of the summer half. On Wednesday Lord Ebrington presided at the examination of the Eton boys for the scholarships left for the Newcastle Scholarship was closed. Fremantle (who in 1859 obtained the Prince Consort's prize for the best French prose) and Archæological prize every) was the successful competitor; Kennedy, K.S., being the medallist and Butler; Pollock, K.S.; Reddie, K.S.; Marsh, K.S.; Mantle, K.S. (the Prince's second German prizeman in 1861 and 1862); Henry Rawlins, K.S.; Cunningham, K.S.; and Talbot, K.S., were also the candidates whose names were considered and passed with credit. The college now numbers 704 in the upper school, and 105 in the lower, making a total of 809 boys.

The Rev. K. L. Shuldham, Assistant Master in College, has been appointed to the valuable Eton College.

The Rev. D. B. R. Bankes, B.A., Sixth Wrangler, Fellow of Corpville and Caius College, Cambridge, to the mathematical mastership in the High School, Bishop Stortford.

The Rev. J. Rice, M.A., of Trinity College, to the head mastership of Weymouth Grammar School.

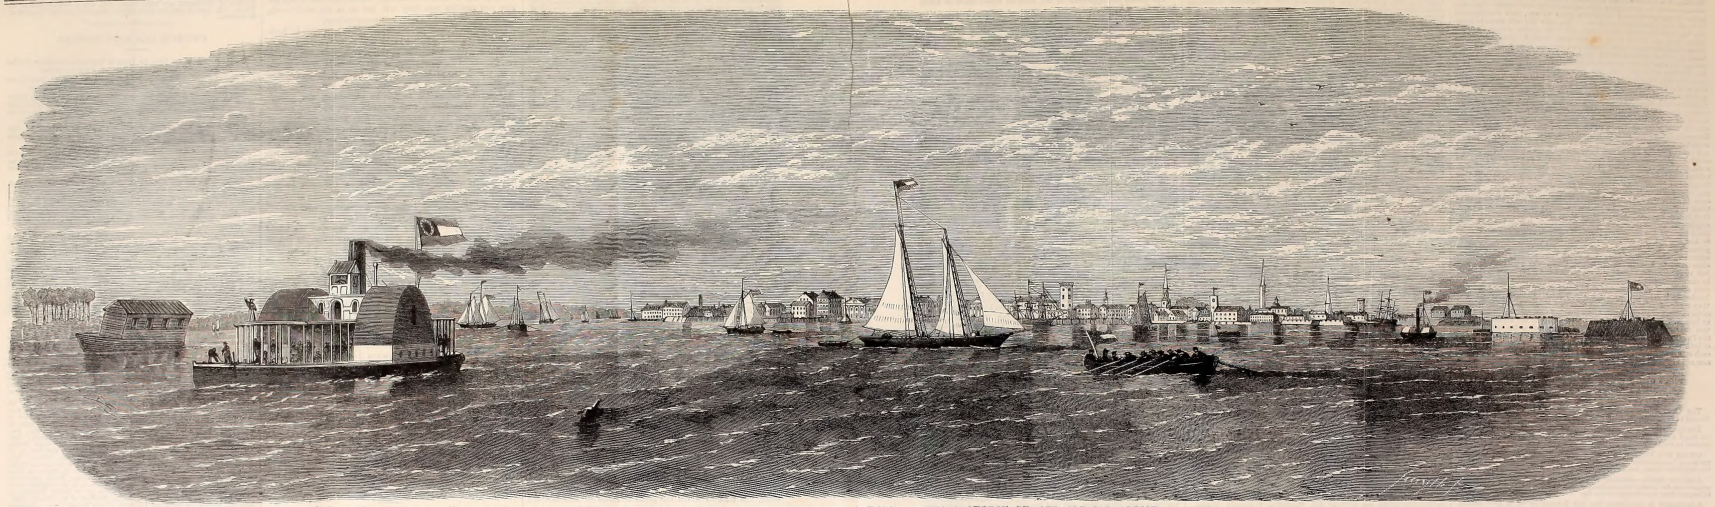
The Rev. J. N. Hammond, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, to the professorship of English Literature in Victoria College, Jersey.

Mr. F. C. Marshall, B.A., of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, to the mastership of the Bridgewater Grammar School.

The Rev. R. T. Evans to the head mastership of the New Grammar School Great Yarmouth.

The Rev. T. D. Whittard to the head mastership of the Junior Department, Cheltenham College.

The head mastership of the High School at Dunedin, New Zealand, has been conferred upon the Rev. Thomas Hewitt Campbell, M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, Master of the Wolverhampton Grammar School.



THE WAR IN AMERICA: CHARLESTON, FROM FORT JOHNSON.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE WAR IN AMERICA.

However difficult the North has found it to make any decided impression upon the territory or spirit of the seceded States of America, it has succeeded, with its great resources, in isolating the South from all but the sympathy of Europe. From this we, in common with many others, have suffered not a little. The gentleman who has for some time past acted as our Special Artist and Correspondent in the Southern States of America finds the greatest difficulty in sending us the results of his labours. Our readers will no doubt remember that a short while back an English officer was arrested while running the blockade, and that the possession of correspondence addressed to us was held, amongst other causes, sufficient to warrant his detention and imprisonment. Upon that occasion the sketches found in his possession were forwarded not to us, but to the managers of Harper's Weekly, in New York, in the columns of which paper they in due time appeared, with a naïve acknowledgment that they were from the pencil of Mr. Vizetelly.

But the large proportion of the Sketches intercepted on their way from the South are doomed never to see the light of day. "What," asks our Correspondent, in the last letter received from him, "has become of Jackson's head-quarters, Lee's head-quarters, Stuart's head-quarters, encampment of the Confederates on the Shenandoah, view of Winchester, and many others? Where are all my letters from the Rappahannock and Richmond, one only of which is inserted, and which has been quoted in all the Southern papers?" Our readers may learn from the above that the long intervals which frequently elapse between our news and engravings of the progress of the war in the Southern States of America arise from no lack of spirit or industry on the part of our Special Artist, but from the impenetrability of the cordon which the North has succeeded in drawing around the seceded provinces. In reference to this subject—the difficulty, namely, of holding postal communication with England—Mr. Vizetelly mentions the fact that the Times' correspondent is said to pay 100 dols. in gold to every messenger who attempts to run the blockade with his letters from the Southern camp to Baltimore, and that they are frequently lost by his emissaries being captured on the Potomac.

At the date of our Correspondent's letter (Feb. 2), Charleston was preparing itself for greater efforts on the part of its enemy than have yet been made against it. "This morning," he writes, "the Ironsides, the largest of the Yankee armour-vessels, has appeared off here; others are reported on their way; and we hear that a last effort is to be made to capture Charleston, the head and front of Secession. All the women and children are preparing to move, and, should the attack be made, I am convinced that the Federals will be beaten off."

Two of our Engravings illustrate the threatened fortifications, harbour, and town of Charleston. Both are taken from the same spot—viz., from Fort Johnson, but one is taken from a point looking seaward, the other up the harbour. When the Confederates bombarded Fort Sumter at the commencement of the war, Forts Johnson and Moultrie were the points from which they made the attack. "Now, all these batteries combined, and many others that have been added have been improved and strengthened to such an extent that it seems," writes Mr. Vizetelly, "impossible that anything can enter the harbour." "I have not," he adds, "drawn all the defences, because I am bound in honour not to divulge them. They will, however, be discovered by the Federal ships whenever they attempt to force a passage."

Our third Engraving illustrates one of the most gallant and courageous deeds of the Southern navy. "For months," writes Mr. Vizetelly, "the people of Charleston have been busily engaged constructing two iron-clad gun-boats on the same plan as the old Merrimac, and within the last few weeks they were completed, and only waited an opportunity to measure their strength with the enemy's fleet blockading the port. This opportunity was given them on the 30th of January.

SEAWARD.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

It was a still, calm night; there was not even a ground-swell on the bar, and everything appeared favourable for the daring attempt. Hearing it was Commodore Ingraham's intention to move out, I made arrangements to accompany this squadron of two vessels that was going to engage the fleet of thirteen ships of war, that was reported to be off Fort Sumter at sundown. The tide did not serve to cross the bar until four a.m. on the 31st, and from eleven o'clock all night when they got under way till half-past three the ironclads cruised solemnly about in the misty moonlight, waiting the hour which was fated to be the last of many of the few. At length the lead gave water enough to cross the bar, and gradually and silently the Palmetto State and the Chicora passed into the open ocean beyond. Several vessels from the time of crossing the bar the Palmetto State came upon the first of the blockaders, the Mercedita. As I guess, everything was conducted upon the unrefined sea. Painted a lead colour, the Confederate could hardly be seen at a greater distance than a hundred yards, and they could be upon each other ere the lookout on the Federal ship hailed the stranger. In another minute the crew of the Palmetto State were aboard, and the Mercedita's timbers, and at the same moment the heavy, rifled gun mounted on the forecastle of the former vessel fired the first shot. Again and again the smoke had thrown away she caused over and commenced settling. A lieutenant and boat's crew put off to ascertain if she was sinking, and, having had a boat's crew put off to ascertain if she was sinking, and, having had a boat's crew put off to ascertain if she was sinking, and, having had a

THE LANCASHIRE OPERATIVES.

We are happy to state that tranquillity has been restored in Stalybridge, Ashton, and other cotton-manufacturing districts in which disturbances lately prevailed, and it is believed that no further breaches of the peace will be attempted. The difference at Stalybridge have been satisfactorily arranged. On Saturday the unemployed operatives accepted the relief-tickets; and it was agreed that in future the relief should be half in money and half in tickets. The deputy-chairman of the Central Relief Committee met Mr. Parnall met the men and thanked them for ensuring into the arrangement. Mr. Rose, the mayor of the secretary of the relief committee, whose house was attacked by the mob, has since left Stalybridge for Wales.

The Manchester Central Executive Relief Committee has issued an address to the operatives of Stalybridge and Hyde urging them to avoid further disturbances that have occurred, and appealing to them to avoid and discourage meetings which may lead to disturbance. The committee point out that there is no reason whatever, that, if the disturbances are continued, it will still discontinue to afford them any relief from the funds at its disposal, and will leave them to get relief in any manner they can from the boards of guardians and "the ordinary channels of relief."

The Earl of Shaftesbury has also sent a letter to the operatives, reminding them that the best years of his life have been spent in doing them service, and imploring them to avoid disagreeable conflicts. The following is the noble writer:—

"My dear Friends—Day by day I receive the most gratifying proofs that you have not forgotten me; and day by day, I may say, that I have you and yours in remembrance. But the long conflict we sustained together, and the great victory of all our labours. I have watched, with inexpressible admiration and gratitude, your noble conduct under the greatest suffering and privation. I have rejoiced to hear the testimony borne by every one to your practical good sense, Christian patience, and power of self-control. Now, I am grieved indeed to hear demeanour and calling to mind your repeated assurances in former years that, as soon as your grievances were redressed, disturbances and violence would be banished from the manufacturing districts, I have felt deeply and truly thankful all the best years of my life had been spent in endeavouring to do you service. You may, then, imagine my sorrow and distress, when I read in the papers the account of the late and shameful outbreak on the part of your own women. I am sure that the great bulk of the operatives do not, and that they will not, approve of such lawless and ferocious conduct. Indeed, I am sure that in general does not know you as well as I do; and I tremble for the fair fame you have won, and so justly acquired. Let me entreat you, then, as sensible, steady, and true portion of the operative class (and it is the vast majority) openly to protest against these disgraceful scenes. I warn those disturbers of our social peace that, if they have grounds of complaint, I will be the way to obtain redress either from the administrators of the common fund or from the public at large. Intimidation and violence are not the effectual and justly powerful means to be employed; I can feel of anything that you have the warm and genuine sympathy of every one of your fellow-men, and that every increase in your good conduct will only conduct will, under God's blessing, obtain for you all the counsel and aid that it in their power to bestow.—Believe me, always, my dear friends, your sincere friend, SHAFTESBURY.

From Manchester Guardian of Tuesday says:—"The committee of the Mansion House meeting were as follow:—31 committed to Chester from Stalybridge; 3 to the Sessions from Ashton; 2 to the Quarter Sessions, Manchester; 1 committed for trial to Chester from Hyde—or a total of 44 to Chester, and 5 to the Sessions. The history of the case in the Chester Assizes, at which Mr. Justice Mellor presides will be tried, commenced on Monday. Mr. Justice Mellor, in charging the grand jury, said that the case came, he had no doubt, within the statute of Edward VI. His Lordship directed that three cases should be taken last, as they were of only minor importance, and aroused serious attention.

At the meeting of the Central Committee, on Monday, Mr. Commissioner Farnall presented a report of the weekly report that there were a large number of persons receiving parochial relief in seventy-seven unions in the cotton-manufacturing districts, as compared with the number on the week of the previous week, of 1,776. There were on the 21st ult. 212,170 persons receiving relief 6 in the permanent-system; in the temporary-system 36,328 persons were so relieved. During the month grants have been made amounting to £47,000, thus making the total grants to that date nearly £117,320. The amount received from various sources during the month of February was £21,500; and the balance in the hands of the Central Committee with Messrs. Heywood Brothers and Co. on the 29th ult. was £4,000; with Messrs. Glyn and Co., £1,000; with the treasurer of the Manchester and Liverpool Districts Banking Company of the local committee being, on the 26th February, £29,736, and the amount in the hands of wages £1,000. There were 1,000 to 2,000 bales of clothing, 85 hampers of wine, and, including the munificent contributions of the New York International Relief Committee, 1,000 barrels of flour and provisions have been distributed to the various local relief committees. The Mansion House fund bids fair to be equal to that of the Mansion House and Central committees; and on the Stalybridge riots, some remarks by the chairman, Mayor Higginbotham, to the effect that compensation were too much disposed to reserve their funds, being severely condemned by Sir A. K. Stansfeld, Mr. Potter, Colonel Patten, and Mr. Farnall.

The Mansion House Committee held their weekly meeting yesterday week, for the purpose of taking into consideration the various applications for relief from the distressed districts, and making grants for that purpose. W. Cubitt, Esq., M.P., the mayor, Mr. Pickering, the cashier, and Mr. Hall, secretary, received up to the previous evening was £470,107, of which sum £367,171 had already been expended or distributed. The total sum to be distributed in relief during the week was £8302, of which £1741 17s. was from home, and £2710 15s. from foreign resources. In accordance with the following scale, being Good Friday, and on that day the period for which the committee had made grants to be extended, in consideration the various applications which made the following additional grants, to be forwarded on Wednesday, as they would not be in time for Thursday's post:—Ashton, £500; Bacup, £200; Chilworth and Foxi, £200; Burnley Ladies' Committee, £150; Milnrow, £150; Broadbottom and Dukinfield, £150; Bradford, £200; Bolton and Overlockers, £100; Managers and Overlookers Stalybridge, £100; Crawshawbooth, £100; Haslingden and Haslingden Overlookers, £100; Rochdale, £300; Rossendale, £200; Overlookers, £40; Walmsley, £20. The total amount for this week is £2,670 17s., and for next week, £4467.

Mr. Bimund Potter proposes, after Easter, to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the state of the cotton manufacturing districts; also to move for administering relief, both by the Poor-law Guardians and the relief committees; and also for a plan of a scheme of emigration for rescuing the operatives of Lancashire from their present unhappy position.

Some interesting additions have been made to the Zoological Society's Gardens during the past week—namely, a "clouded tiger," two Malaysian tapirs, a white-fronted capuchin monkey, a white-tailed gnu, a Burchell's two-little zebra gerbes or "dun-chicky" birds, rarely seen in captivity; a female Sumatran rhinoceros, a Cape francolin, and five Senegal parrots. But the most important addition has been three wombats from Australia, the largest ever seen.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

From our City Correspondent.

NOTWITHSTANDING that the imports of the precious metals have exceeded £1,000,000, and that £500,000 in gold has been dispatched to the coast of England, and that there is very little demand for bullion on Continental account, the business done in Lombard-street this week has been on a large moderate; nevertheless, prices have been fairly supported. The Unfunded Debt has continued to decrease.

The supply of money is on the increase, and the demand for accommodation is moderately active, as the annexed table from the Bank-return clearly shows:—

Thirty days' bills ...	2½ to 4 per cent.	Four months' bills ...	4½ to 4¾ per cent.
Sixty days' bills ...	4 to 4¼	Six months' bills ...	4¼ to 4½
Three months' bills ...	4 to 4¼

In the Stock Exchange, loans on Government Securities are offering at 2½ per cent, but the demand is by no means active.

Subjoined are the current rates of money in the chief Continental cities :—

	Bank-rate per cent.	Open market per cent.		Bank-rate.	Open market.
Paris ...	4	3	Amsterdam	3½	3½
Vienna ...	5	4	Brussels ...	3	3
Berlin ...	4	3	Hamburg ...	3	3
Frankfort ...	4	3	Petersburg ...	7	6

The Continental exchanges are very favourable. Advices from New York bring the extraordinary rate of twenty bills at 111, and the remittance on gold 1½. These rates are in favour of a large export of gold to England.

A considerable amount appears to have been done in the value of the Securities at Calcutta—viz., from 3 to 4 per cent.

The Council for India has disposed of £600,000 in bills on the various Presidencies, at previous rates. The approximate within the limits were for about £1,000,000 sterling.

The steamer for the West Indies has taken out £29,160 in gold, and £6000 in silver.

The dividends at the Bank of England will become payable on the 8th inst. The rumour at the Bank Court of Directors on Thursday last of a further increase of £978,517 in the value of our exports compared with the same month last year.

The sum of £4453 has come to hand on account of the New Granada indemnities.

The Consul Market was somewhat heavy on Monday, and a slight decline took place in the following:—Consols, for Money, left off 93¼ to ¾, and for the 7th of May, 93⅝; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92½ 91; Exchequer Bills, 4s. to 1s. dis.; India Stock, 227 to 229; Ditto, New, 104½ 1; Rupee Paper, 106 to ¾ and 113½; the Bonds, 10s. to 15s. prem.; and the Debentures, 10s. On Tuesday Consols realized 93¼ for Money, and 93⅜ for May; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92½ 91; India Stock for Cents, 104½ 1; Rupee Paper, 106 to ¾ and 113½; India Bonds, 10s. to 15s. prem.; Ditto, Debentures, 10s. On Tuesday Consols realized 93¼ for Money, and 93⅜ for May; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92½ 91; India Stock, 227 to 229; Ditto, New, 104½ 1; Rupee Paper, 106 to ¾ and 113½; the Bonds, 10s. to 15s. prem.; and the Debentures, 10s. On Wednesday the Market was firmer. Consols, for Money and the present Account, realized 93⅝ to ½ for May, 93⅞ to ⅝; the Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92½ to ⅝; and Exchequer Bills, 4s. to 3s. dis.

Greek bonds have ruled firm, and prices have been well supported.—Turkish Consolide have realized 43¾; and a slight improvement has taken place in the value of Italian stock. Mexican and Peruvian Securities are somewhat easier; but Brazilian and Spanish continue steady. Mexican Account realized 21 ⅜ to ⅝ prem.; Danish, par to ¼ prem.; Russian, 1 to ¼ prem.; and Italian, 14 ⅛ to ¼ prem. The following quotations have been made:—Ditto, Bonds, Chilian Four-and-a-Half Cents, 85; Egyptian, 97½; Ditto, Second Issue, 90; Greek, 24¾; Little, Coupons, 12; Mexican Three per Cents, 14; New Granada, 14½; Ditto, Deferred, 6; Ditto, Land Warrants, 2⅝; Peruvian Deferred, 17½; Ditto, New Bonds, 17½; Portuguese, 37; Russian, 1877, 92; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1860, 93⅜; Ditto, 1862, 93½; Spanish Three per Cents, 44½; Ditto, Passive, 9⅞; Ditto, Certificates, 9; Turkish 1st Six per Cents, 90½; Ditto, 1858, 68½; Ditto, Small, 71¼; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1862, 43¾; Ditto, Scrip, 4 dis.; Ditto, Six per Cents, 1862, 70½.

No material change has taken place in the value of Joint-stock Bank Shares; the decline in the Bank of England, however, has depressed prices. good report, he uniformly dealt with the inhabitants of the vast empire which he considered it the duty of England to govern for the benefit of the people. He was emphatically the man who justified the British rule in India, who struck hard for it when need there was, but who never forgot that the natives were God's creatures, fellow-men, communities of an ancient civilisation, over whom, for some good and wise purpose, we were permitted to hold sway and governance." In defence of these principles Sir James Outram spoke and acted boldly, although as a soldier his sword was always at the command of the Government. For instance — differing wholly from Sir Charles Napier in the policy pursued with the Ameers of Scinde, Sir James Outram yet took a distinguished part in the war against them, and a large share of the booty (£10,000) fell to his lot. But he returned this sum to the Government, with the explanation that although his duty had obliged him to fight against those who had been declared the enemies of his country, his conscience would not permit him to share in the spoils of the war.

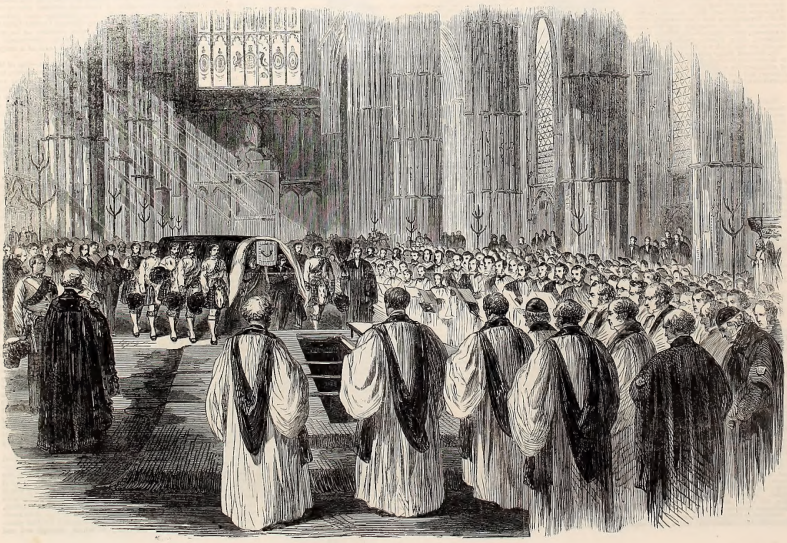
In 1856, after many years of varied and arduous labour, Outram returned with broken health and enfeebled frame to England. Before he had time for any salutary rest the rupture with Persia occurred, and the gallant soldier at once, forgetting his ailments, applied for and accepted the command of the expedition. The history of the short and successful Persian campaign of 1857 has been almost forgotten in that of the great Indian mutiny which followed it so closely, and the doughty deeds of the men who brought it to so successful a conclusion have not unnaturally been altogether eclipsed by their still more brilliant achievements on Indian soil. While Sir James Outram's army was collected on the shores of the Persian Gulf ready to return, the native Bengal army broke out into a mutiny, which shortly became a fierce rebellion; and in a little while the British rule in India burned but dimly in a few isolated spots, and seemed too likely to be trampled out altogether. Landing at Bombay in July, 1857, Sir James Outram, thinking nothing, in the need there was of united, determined action, of his shattered health, hastened at once to Calcutta and placed his sword at the service of the Governor General. It was accepted, of course, and a portion of his gallant Persian army, under the command of his old

THE LATE LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR JAMES OUTRAM, BART.

Lieutenant, Havelock, made that famous retributory march across Central India which will be ever remembered as one of the greatest and most gallant achievements of British arms. Overtaking his old comrades on their road to Lucknow, Sir James Outram, waiving, as it will be remembered, his right to lead them, entered the rebellious city under Havelock's command, and at the head simply of a detachment of volunteer cavalry. It will be remembered that Sir Henry Havelock's gallant advance on Lucknow did not cause the siege to be raised. What he succeeded in doing with such astonishing courage was to force supports in to the distressed and weakened garrison. At once he and his gallant comrades were inclosed by the vast hordes everywhere threatening the Presidency, and held out bravely until the arrival of Sir Colin Campbell and the second relief of Lucknow. Left behind again at Alumbagh to do his best against the enemy, who were still swarming in the neighbourhood of Lucknow, Outram held this post, an important link in the chain between Cawnpore and Lucknow, and when the right time came aided Sir Colin Campbell materially in the final capture of the offending city. Subsequently appointed Chief Commissioner of the still rebellious province, Sir James Outram worked hard and effectively to restore it to the British rule.

But with the end of the war ill health again settled upon him. When, the need of action over, he took his armour off, the noble determination that had so long revived and strengthened him failed. Dacca gave him time and opportunity to know himself to be seriously, dangerously ill. He came home again; and, after a short period of uncertain health, died at Pau on the 11th of March last.

The character of Sir James Outram may be summed up in a very few words. Brave, chivalrous, honest, impetuous, humane—if ever there lived an Englishman who was prepared to give and forgive all in the simple, unselfish, discharge of duty, Jame: Outram was that man. In a dearth of great men he would have achieved a position far higher than that very lofty one to which he attained—in the absence of his self-denying qualities he might have extracted a greater share of admiration from the world, perhaps, but he would infallibly have lost all claim to the affection with which his country now regards his memory. Among the many great men who won and hold our Indian empire for us, the name of Sir James



FUNERAL OF THE LATE SIR JAMES OUTRAM IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Outram will ever hold a distinguished position. Still higher meed of praise, whenever the world sums up the list of those who have been good as well as great, to James Outram, whose admirable qualities extorted even from a political enemy the appellation of "the Bayard of India," must be given a foremost place.

MARIAN LANGIEWICZ.

In spite of the cloud which at present hangs over the reputation and fortunes of Marian Langiewicz, the following brief particulars of one who but a few days back concentrated upon himself the gaze of Europe and the hopes of a noble and ill-fated nation cannot fail to be interesting to our readers.

Marian Langiewicz was born in the Grand Duchy of Posen (Prussian Poland) on the year 1827. His father was a physician. His elder brother is now following the paternal profession at Wilkowo, in Posen. The schoolboy life of young Langiewicz did not differ from that of boys of his age and nation. The preparation which the King of Prussia was flattering himself he could Germanise, and the Czar of Russia that he could Russianise, grow up a race of conspirators from their earliest boyhood. It was but natural that the tastes of the patriotic Polish youth should incline them towards the military profession. To become an accomplished soldier, and in this capacity to serve his country only, was the leading purpose of Langiewicz's early life. He entered at the University of Breslau, whence he went to that of Prague, with a view of studying the Sclavonic languages under Professor Cesiakowski. After a few months, however, he returned to Breslau to study mathematics, and subsequently accepted a situation as tutor in the family of a Polish nobleman. Two years later he returned to Breslau to complete his studies, and then went to a military school at Berlin and served his year in the Prussian artillery. But it was no part of his plan of life to defend the throne of their Prussian Majesties. When, therefore, in 1859, Napoleon III. declared war against Austria, Langiewicz resigned his commission in the Prussian service and followed the stream of exiles to Italy. The sudden peace of Villafranca baulked his hopes of seeing service for a time. He offered the aid of his technical knowledge to Garibaldi, and took part in the secret preparations for the daring attempt upon Sicily in 1860. He was one of the renowned Thousand of Marsala, and crossed over to the continent with Garibaldi, whose fortunes he followed throughout the Neapolitan campaign in the capacity of an artillery officer. After the disbandment of Garibaldi's little army, the popular hero of Italy, pleased with his talents, recommended him to Louis Mieroslawski, illustrious both as a patriot and a soldier, who was then conducting a small school in Paris for the military instruction of the youth of the Polish emigration in that city. Mieroslawski offered Langiewicz the situation of instructor of artillery. The offer was accepted, and Langiewicz removed to Paris. The school was subsequently transferred to Genoa, by the permission of the Italian Government. Thence it migrated to Cunco, and was suppressed immediately after the recognition of the kingdom of Italy by Russia. Langiewicz withdrew to Paris, where he lived in obscurity and poverty for some months, until he heard of the outbreak of the insurrection in Poland. Then, borrowing fifty francs, he set off for Thorn at the end of January, and hurried thence to the seat of the insurrection. He presented himself to the insurgents, and they named him their leader. He led them into the difficult country bordering on Gallicia, and found there some Government works which his technical knowledge enabled him to convert into a factory of firearms. After beating the Russians in half a dozen encounters he was appointed by the Revolutionary Committee a General in the national army. It is at this time that Western Europe became familiar with his name. He continued an active partisan warfare, avoiding a pitched battle where possible, and never fighting but in positions chosen by himself. Always on the move, his celerity enabled him to surprise or baffle the various Russian corps who pursued him and endeavoured to hem him in. On the 10th of March he proclaimed himself (with the assent of the Revolutionary Committee) Dictator of Poland. But the days of his power were short. We have yet to learn all the causes which led to his fall, but it seems certain that, hedged in by the Russians, he was obliged on the 18th to accept battle with them near Zagoscie, in the Palatinate of Sandomir. His forces were dispersed, and he, in the endeavour to pass through Austrian Poland into another Palatinate of Russian Poland, was detected by an over-zealous official, and shortly afterwards became a prisoner in the hands of Austria.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

It is quite possible that, even under the mesmerising influence of a Premier who rules Parliament, according to the testimony of a hostile Peer, with a greater concurrence of opinion in his favour than any witness, while a greater number are present, has been hitherto unanimously voted to be humdrum may yet acquire that sort of personal interest which generally makes debates lively, if not exactly gay. Indeed, Lord Palmerston himself, while lauding and eulogising Mr. Bright's admission of his semi-omnipotence, hinted that there were some subjects which even he would rather not meddle with, lest he should rouse dormant antagonism in a well-sopped House of Commons. But the seekers after shadows of coming events imagine that they can perceive symptoms of unrest in the unanimous notices of motion for after Easter given in one night; in the occasional outbreaks of individual dissatisfaction and resistance; and in the notable fact of the reappearance in his place of Sir Vincent Scully, who received a hearty welcome when he stood up and, gave a notice a yard long, which argumentatively stated all the grievances of Ireland, according to the notion of Sir Cork. The Speech bore some sort of promise, and, judging from the nervous excitement—we had almost said irritability—of Mr. Gladstone, and the natural gaiety of Mr. Disraeli, there seems reserving himself for something—burning his wrath to keep it warm—it is quite possible that a month's claptrap and stupidity may not much stir even by pot out of the financial scheme.

To descend to particulars. Begging Mr. Hubbard's pardon for talking of descending, in connection with a gentleman of such lofty pretensions, we must congratulate him on giving a new tone and character to his annual speech on the Sugar Duties. He was no case of repeating word for word a part set down, and which a less original performer would never stray from; but, assuming that every performer would never stray from; but, assuming that every-body knew the egg comprehended his plan for equalising an impost by turning it round and putting one end of it where the other used to be, he introduced it with a flight of metaphysical finance till his argument was lost in the whirl of his gyrations. He was serious; for Mr. Hubbard never could be, if indeed, he is rather vivacious; yet one never saw so many members asleep at six o'clock as on this occasion. But the process of getting through a name is said to produce a tendency to stupefaction. Some surprise was felt when Mr. Leatham rose from the chief place amongst the seats below the gangway on the Ministerial side, and moved the motion of a High Church Tory; for nominally, and in man's unwavering sense, Mr. Leatham is the member for the Borough of the north of England, although there are some persons who, studying some of his speeches during the last autumnal recess, are inclined to think that he is more of a philosopher than a practical Radical. As may be known to many, the gentleman moulds his oratory on that of Mr. Bright, whose style of speech is rough and intonation he has caught with that kind of success which belongs to imitators; but, on the whole, Mr. Leatham is tolerably well, and produces an inoffensive water-colour sketch of the bold colourist's broad and powerful manner. But Mr. Leatham does not like Peers, for he has qualities of his own which entitle him to a smart debater and a keen and discriminating critic. Witness the sharp and forcible exposure of Lord Stanley of Olton's attempt at the same subject as that then under discussion, and which he might well have been expected to hyperbolise in favour of his own political the life of Lethington, when Bothwell and Huntley attempted to assassinate him at Dunbar. Mr. Haylar's picture of an old French woman with eggs in her lap for sale—a study, probably, at Boulogne or its neighbourhood—has very remarkable daylight effect, and admirable truth of character in the grim, wrinkled face, and thin, gnarled hands. A larger picture of a laughing lady matching wits with the equivocal title "Sugar?" (163) is not so good in drawing, colour, or finish, though not without this artist's unfailing felicity of expression. There is, although the colour is unpleasantly "raw," much to admire and commend in Mr. Heaphy's picture, "Labour's Sanctities" (85), and the same praise must be given to Mr. Pettie's "Rizzio Embroiled, and watched, with almost regretful sympathy, by a childless palace. The high merit of truthful expression, invariably combined with technical shortcomings must be conceded to No. 189, by Mr. Emmerson, in which we see an anxious wife and mother looking in vain for her husband's boat. The doctor's picture (No. 190) by the humorous expression are Mr. Morgan's brazen-faced lawyers, the one pleading in a case of "Assault" Promise of Marriage" (70) by Mr. Levin's elaborate "sketch" (258) there is good atmospheric effect, and all the animated bustle of Covent Garden on a market morning. Mr. Hay's "Summer-time and the Last Magazine" (146) is almost negative as to "subject," and somewhat commonplace in taste, but shows a sure mastery of the "material" of oil painting. Mr. Hoyd (a name new to us) sends an "Inundation, an Inundation" (160)—an infant floating in its cradle, and a Newfoundland dog swimming to the rescue, which has some excellent points as well as very obvious defects. Mr. Morris's direct plagiarism, in No. 172, of the "motif" and even quotation of a picture by Mr. Hook, is reprehensible. Besides the merit of the picture, the latter is somewhat unquestionable. "Butterdays" (314) is in a style so flimsy, and with so little nature in it, that for the catalogue, we should have rather suspected it to be from the same hand.

Our limited space confines us to little more than simple mention of a very droll little picture, by Mr. F. Weekes, of a modern Greek with his comical cap and a most unclassical profile, seated apathetically smoking a pipe, called "Athens is tranquil—vide The Papers." Mr. W. J. W. Webb's "Country Courtship" (671) over a cow's back and the calf upsetting the milk-pail, is painted pleasantly enough. Mr. F. Barnes; two small pictures by Mr. T. F. Dickses, very pretty, but monotonously like former works; Mr. Pope's "Pros and Captive" (417)—a reprise acted at the counter-wicket of the pawn-shop, as sun looks pensively; Mr. A. F. Patten's powerfully-painted Arab's head (460); Mr. Shotter's "Evening of Life" (611), and Mr. Lee's picture from a picture by Mr. Gale; "The Woodhouse" (67), a small effective picture by Mr. Hemsley (No. 112), a scrubby "Bit" by Mr. Mason (No. 113); "An Italian Flower Girl" (493), by Mr. Ossani, which seems to us to deserve a better place; Mr. Rossiter's "Making Music" (216), and the "Bird's nesters, Ingleby," (No. 218) by Mr. Cranstone, which, as apparently a faithful representation of a scene of "Southern life," will awaken interest, but is not in any way remarkable simply as a work of art. The visitor will also find merit of some kind or degree in works by Messrs. Heath, F. S. Cary, C. Cooper Henderson, Cooper, J. Hardy, jun., Lodovici, Adshead, Anderson, J. T. Lucas, Jerome, Dowling, Finnie, Brownlow, Chester Earles, C. Goldie, L. Smyth, and Sly.

Among the few portraits here this year we need particularise only three, by Mr. Henry Williams—"John Smith, Esq., Keeper of the Records in the Court of Probate" (209); a group of children by the seaside (159); and "John Rogerson, Esq." (215). In addition to very much possible water-colour painting, these works recommend themselves by that faithfulness to nature which always carries with it its own reward; but, unfortunately for art, and for the public, has now to compete with photography, become rare indeed in recent portraiture.

The average quality of the landscapes in this exhibition is perhaps higher than that of the classes we have reviewed; but we must deter a notice of them till next week.

ARCHITECTURAL AND SOCIETY OF SCULPTORS EXHIBITIONS.

THE Architectural Exhibition and first annual exhibition of the New Society of Sculptors opened on Thursday week. As we have always contended to be the case, unnecessary jealousy is made for the works of sculptors who might contribute to be exhibited with the architectural designs, &c., in the same rooms, at No. 5, Conduit-street, Regent-street. That very close relationship and the mutual dependence of these two branches of the fine arts have hitherto been entirely overlooked in this country—a statement proved by most of our public monuments; and, although under the best to be expected of a first effort in sculpture under many discouraging circumstances, we welcome every attempt at placing the productions of sculptor, architect, mural painter, and designer side by side, as it will undoubtedly every effort to obtain for sculpture due recognition and fair exhibition. Besides the additional interest which the combination this year's architectural exhibition has another fresh feature of interest—a few Continental architects and mural painters have been induced to contribute. We refer in particular, among the latter, to the noble series of cartoons for the mural paintings executed by the Belgian artists, Messrs. Leys and Swerts, in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, Antwerp, which were unfortunately destroyed, when on the eve of completion, by fire the day before that which destroyed Mr. Hill's. Still finer are some cartoons of religious subjects executed in Belgian churches by the same eminent painters. Still, however, several of the most eminent architects are absent, including Mr. Scott, Mr. Tite, Mr. Sydney Smirke, the brothers Barry and Allom, Professor Kerr, Mr. Penrose, and Mr. Pennethorne. Mr. Street, however, has a few of the more interesting items in the present architectural exhibition, consisting of designs and drawings for churches, &c., for the new church at Kelendorf, Rhenish Prussia, and other designs, by M. Cuypers; a design for a window in Westminster Abbey; by Messrs. Lavers and Barraud; and several by Messrs. Heaton and Butler; photograph of the accepted and capitol design for the new Langham Hotel, Regent-street, by Mr. Giles; façade of the Conventual Church erecting for Sir George Bowyer at Knowsley, Lancaster-street, by Messrs. Gilbert and Son; of the Countess of Huntingdon, by Mr. J. L. Pedley; designs for Bath Theatre and Malvern College; mosaic decoration from the pavement of Exeter Cathedral, now removed, by Mr. Gambier Kribham Hall; a Retoration of the Westminster Chapter House; View of the Church erected to be erected at St. John's Wood Bridge, and the Reredos for Lichfield Cathedral, by Mr. G. G. Scott, R.A.; several admirable designs by Mr. Street; others by Mr. E. B. Lamb. There will also be found a very effective composition of the numerous works of ecclesiastical and domestic character, executed at home and abroad by the late decade, by Mr. Norton; a still more imposing drawing of London, with a design for the embankment, by Mr. Barry; and by Mr. Allom, altar paintings, &c., by Mr. Charles Goldie; Continental studies, by Mr. Digby Wyatt; and Mr. T. L. Donaldson's design for the Law Burgess; the prize plan, &c., by Mr. Morgan, of the great barracks for the Guards, now being erected at Chelsea; Honolulu Cathedral, and the Catholic Chapel, Shoreditch; Mr. Slater; a large view of works recently erected by Mr. Truefitt; suggestions for the improvement of the International Exhibition building; views by Mr. Bell and Nicholl; the Bayswater Athanæum, by Messrs. Newman and Billing; "Architectural Sculpture," by Mr. Redgrave; designs by Messrs. Deane and Woodward; photographs from cartoons, by Messrs. Gullens and Sworets; studies of works executed by Mr. Clutton; specimens of ironfounding and manufacture, by Messrs. Skidmore, Jun., Francis Duke and Co., and other well-known firms, and of mosaic, by Chevalier Salviati, Messrs. Burke, Shaw and Co.

The sculpture consists for the most part of busts and statuettes; but several have contributed to encourage the promotion of the exhibition. We trust on a future occasion to see more works designed strictly for architecture, such as bas-reliefs for reredos, mortuary works, monuments for niches, altar-tombs, canopies, &c. A few of the contributions have been previously exhibited. Among the chief exhibitors are Messrs. H. Weekes, A.R.A.; A. Munro, W. Behnes, E. A. Foley, Cribbendon, O'Doherty, Monti, Loft, Sharp, Woolner, Timmins, Durham, Bridges, Hewlett, Ulyatt, and J. Wyon. Many reproductions in bronze, terra-cotta, and parian of celebrated works are also exhibited by the Art-Union of London, Messrs. Elkington, Messrs. Copeland, Messrs. Battam and Son, &c.

The medal commemorative of the Royal wedding, which we some time since announced as in course of being engraved by Mr. Leonard O. Wyon, is completed, and issued in gold, silver, and bronze by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. The medal presents on the obverse the double portraits of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and on the reverse the combined coats of arms of the Princess. The portrait of the Prince is from sittings granted to Mr. Wyon, and that of the Princess from a photographic likeness taken in Denmark. The likenesses are excellent, though, in reference to the Prince's head, more general truth to nature might have been obtained by greater elevation for the point of view.

Mr. Marshall Wood has been commissioned to execute a bust for her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, as a companion to the excellent bust of the Prince executed recently. Her Royal Highness will honour Mr. Wood with sittings at Marlborough House early in the ensuing month.

Mr. George Lance, the eminent painter of still-life, &c., has received a diploma from the Société d'Artistes Belges, an honour which has been conferred on few artists of any country.

The whilom New Society of Painters in Water Colours have taken a new name, and are the "Institute of Painters in Water Colours" with open their exhibition in their new gallery, Pall-mall, towards the end of the present month.

Mr. F. M. Ward, R.A., is about to execute in water-glass, in accordance with the general desire of the Commons' Corridor, the picture from the sketch approved by the Royal Commission, of "The Landing of Queen Eleanor."

At the gallery of Messrs. Colnaghi, Scott, and Co., the eminent print-publishers of Pall-mall, the portrait of her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, painted by Winterhalter, by M. Lauchert, in the "Court painter of Berlin," is now being exhibited. From this portrait Mr Samuel Cousins, R.A., is to execute an engraving, to be published by this firm. The Princess is dressed in simple white muslin. The pose is very graceful. Though it cannot affect the engraving, the colouring of the picture is unpleasing. The artist has thrown taken the place of those tender, pearly tones found in nature at the roots of the hair and on the delicate temples of the face. It is known to, we understand, considered satisfactory, but we are glad to hear that Mr. Cousins is to be honoured with sittings.

LITERATURE.

To the general student who seeks to make himself acquainted with his broad principles of architectural science, Mr. Ruskin has given an inclination to attempt to master its complicated theories and innumerable facts. Every building presents to him a problem of many ideas, not of the ordinary succession of geological strata, but of the causes by which, or the conditions under which, they were formed. We have been favoured with a prologue to a dry and barren affair of mere memory; with them it is a noble science, opening enchantingly the fountains of reflection. Many of these conferences relating to the primitive history of this globe, from the inconceivably remote periods when the earth was a molten mass, to the first appearance of its surface, successive rising and sinking of land and water, and more sudden and violent changes, it was rendered so fit habitation for man, are full of interest, and may open their eyes to imagination, and should therefore be carefully separated from the facts of science. We regret that the author's fertile imagination has frequently pushed the road with marvellous felicity to the discovery of the facts of science and left the student of those facts behind. It therefore hall any attempt which would seem to render the great deductions of geology more easy of appreciation, and we have none to be set by the side of the aggregation of fresh facts in support of scientific theory. Both Agassiz and Ansted have, up to a recent period, followed Dr. Unger, of Vienna, in an ingenious work, translated by Mr. S. Highley, and recently published under the title Ideal Views of the Primeval World in its Successive Conditions. The work is illustrated by seventeen photographs, reduced copies of the original lithographs, by Professor Heer, of Zurich, published by Mr. Waterhouse Hawkins's restorations of extinct animals. Mr. Samuel Highley, in the translation, is favourably known for his efforts to make science and also art, by means of photography and the magic lantern. We gave a report a short time since of a lecture on the subject by Mr. Highley, in particular, which we hope which this gentleman has opened an exhibition, illustrative of this application of photography, at the Polytechnic Gallery, Regent-street. Dr. Unger modestly claims for his "ideal views" an esthetic interest merely; but we have increased appreciation of the grandeur of the geological periods, however, that, besides their scientific interest, they have considerable claim to be set by the side of the aggregation of fresh facts in support of scientific theory. Both these objects are attained by the work before us, which is, beyond all comparison, the best and readiest medium of instruction. The design of the author is to present a series of pictures of successive phases of the aspects of the primitive world, its successive Flora and Fauna, distribution of land and water, and atmospheric and climatic influences, in all the great geologic periods, based upon paleontological and geological data and deduction of probabilities. In the first two of the Conferences delivered by the author recently, that the vapour surrounding the heated globe was first allowed to condense upon its cooler crust, and produced the primeval ocean. The universal waste of waters, when the first elementary forms of animal and vegetable life made their appearance. The first land, the primeval Laurentian mountains, and their successive upheaval; then, in the Transition period, we see strange vegetable forms, bearing neither fruit nor flowers, submarine life in the primeval seas. Then, the first breathing in far more than tropical heat, the luxuriant evergreen forests of the Coal Measures, their submergence beneath sea, and afterwards broken up and partially destroyed by the shocks which shattered the earth's crust; the formation of the old red sandstone, the abundant coal measures of the Secondary period, the chalk long beneath; the calmer period of the new red sandstone, when we find the first bird and mammalian remains; the Tertiary period, the long hymnds of age which necessarily constituted the succeeding geological era, and, finally, which has a considerable interest for mankind, actually assume more complex forms and organisation, till, with the present alluvium, the surface of the earth is a fitting habitation for the Creator's last work, the noblest organism of all, man. The author by criticises these beautiful designs as it would be difficult to execute them; but we have no doubt that the photographic process will many of the representations to interfere with the pleasure and profit the work as a whole is calculated to afford.

One or two novels of recent issue are entitled to be considered on their merits, and we proceed to give a brief sketch of them. Mr. Kinkaid's pleasant story, Dalton Brothers, is the first of a series of a class which, though often homely in their subjects, work out the finest principles of morality, and the duty of life in the first terest turns on the operation of the system of impressment of seamen. The elder brother, Dalton, is impressed, and has to be bound up in the administration of naval affairs. At Monkhaven, the town which is the seat of the story, is a port from which the Greenland whale fishery is largely carried on, it is too obvious a nursery for an excellent class of sailors not to be especially favoured by the pressgang. Some admirable delineations of the frantic misery of the friends of men seized from a whaling-ship on her return from a voyage are to be found in the description of the scene which then takes place. But the interest of the story turns on Sylvia, the heroine, who is the only two lovers proper—not more, as the title of the book might lead one to suppose—and the contrast between the sisters; and with some cause, for he is painted in the early part of the book disagreeably enough; and another, when she returns for the very ordinary but very sufficient reason that he is drawn as the very bean ideal of a high-spirited, frank-hearted sailor. After difficulties had been overcome which prevented for a time the completion of their happiness the betrothed lover is seized by a pressgang and carried off, a circumstance which is used to base advantage by the rejected one, who in the end marries the heroine, when only motive is to obtain a home for her mother after her father has been executed for a crime which arose from his interference with the inevitable pressgang. The manifold life of a couple so ill-adapted is admirably depicted; and circumstances occur which place the heroine in a position of great temptation, and drive the husband in despair from his home. The story thenceforth is worked out with singular power and great variety of interest, and the termination of the narrative is elicited out of a complication of passions, feelings, and events with consummate skill, while probability is not in the least outraged. We very much respect the author and have been equal to her reputation in this work.

The next work to which we have to call attention is also eminently a delineation of human passion, but it is treated from a refined and decorous point of view, and is suggestive only of the sickness of sentimentive people, whose habits of high-wrought imaginations, and others imbued with a feeling which may be described as a mixture of Gothic pride and inoffensive pedantry. In St. Olives, a book which does not bear the name of the author, and which has been published by Hurst and Blackett, we believe, we have the history of a female hand, and that of a lady in every sense of the term. The fortunes, or, rather, the misfortunes, of a Scotch gentleman who is described as a manly specimen of the first order, and of great original power as a composer, have brought him, accompanied by his maiden sister, into the position of organist of the cathedral of St. Olaves. Neither of these personages is young, but each of them is so drawn as to have a special interest attached to them. The scene chosen for their quiet and resigned struggle with what are palpably altered circumstances—altered down the verge of poverty—gives opportunity for some excellent and truthful delineation of the life of a cathedral town. From church dignitaries and their spouses, who are "genteel people," as at any trade, and lower, than the humble from whom they derive their importance, down to the recipients of such organised charity as is to be found in a city rigidly set at disregard, the writer has painted with much skill in the delineation of character and not a little quiet humour. The incidents of the tale afford opportunity for a sufficient amount of romance to take out of the region of commonplace, the loves, sorrows, and joys of which it treats. The style of writing is fluent and free from affectation and to the requirements of local colouring; and, although at first there is a sensation of slowness in the movement of events, yet as the reader proceeds the interest increases to the end. The whole is produced in such always very intense, there is a sufficient charm about the narrative to render the perusal satisfactory. A considerable portion of the tale is unusually well got up, being printed on a thick tinted paper, the vellum-like appearance of which is somewhat startling to be thick tinted paper, the vellum-like appearance of which is somewhat startling to be thick tinted paper, the vellum-like appearance of which is somewhat startling to be

INSTALLATION OF LORD PALMERSTON AS LORD RECTOR OF GLASGOW UNIVERSITY.

THE ceremony of installing Lord Palmerston as Lord Rector of the Glasgow University took place, on Monday afternoon, in the Church of St. John, which, long before the hour appointed for the ceremony, was crowded with students, who exhibited uproarious merriment, greeting the name of the noble Premier with vociferous cheering, and beguiling the time with snatches of popular melodies, among which "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled," and "Auld lang syne," and the National Anthem obtained great prominence. An attempt, just before the entry of Lord Palmerston, to sing the 100th Psalm to Old Hundred was received with some dissipation, but ultimately succeeded.

The Premier arrived at the college in a carriage and four, escorted by a detachment of the Royal Regiment of Lancashire Militia, and was received by Principal Barclay, by whom he was presented to the various professors. The noble Lord was duly conducted to the chair by the Senieres Rector of St. John's, where he was waited upon by a deputation from the Liberal-Conservative and Liberal Advocate Associations of the University, and presented two addresses; one thanking his Lordship for accepting the office of Lord-Rector, and the other expressing sympathy with the Italian struggle for freedom. The noble Lord very briefly acknowledged the addresses, and, accompanied by the Principal and professors, proceeded to the hall, which was received with great enthusiasm. Among those in attendance were the Duke of Argyll, Lord Colonsay, Baronesses the Hon. Sir Fortescue Fellow, Sir Right Hon. W. Cowper, M.P.; Sir T. Gladstone, M.P.; the Hon. F. Kinnaird, M.P.; Lord Provost Blackie, M.P.; Mr. Dalglish, M.P.; Mr. Buchanan, M.P.; and Mr. Ewing, M.P.

A prayer having been offered up, Lord Palmerston, rising to address the students, was received with loud and repeated cheers. When silence had been obtained his Lordship said—

Gentlemen,—I beg in the first instance to return you my most sincere and heartfelt thanks for the great honour you have done me by placing me in the position in which I now stand before you to-day. It must be a matter of pride to any man to have been the same academical chair that has been filled and dignified men eminent in all the departments of intellect who have in former times held the office in which, by your favour, I have now been placed. I had no right to expect that honour at your hands. It came upon me unsolicited and therefore I was the more gratified at receiving such a mark of your approval. I have as academical connection with you; that portion of my instruction which was bestowed upon me in my youth was received at your sister University of Edinburgh, and I must always feel grateful for that which I there received. The only return which you could make to me would be for the high office to which you have raised me must have been your belief that in my public conduct I have constantly endeavoured to do my form my duty, and that belief on my part must afford me the highest gratification personally which, on the other hand, I should experience to think that the example which you have set, of thus rewarding those whose public duties have been discharged with zeal and fidelity, encouraged those who are engaged in public life; and what is perhaps still more important, it may be a stimulus to the rising generation, who may be destined to fill offices and different functions in this country, will be actuated in your own conduct by the knowledge which you believe to have been exercised in your own will, in whatever position you may be placed, to the best of your endeavours faithfully to discharge your duties. Well, gentlemen, I have to perform a duty which you have imposed upon me, and which custom imposes upon those who fill this office—the duty of addressing you upon some subject upon the subject of your education. You are now all of you in that period of life which, as Shakespeare has pointed out, is devoted to what may be in a limited sense, called education. You are now at that time when the mind is most open to instruction, when the faculties are most susceptible of being let deepest into your plastic intelligence, when the impressions which are made are not easily effaced, and when the habits which are then formed are those which produce the most lasting conviction. That period of instruction which is devoted to study is one during the time when you have to acquire a stock of knowledge, and when they are called upon to enter into the busy scenes of active life, is that which, in a limited sense, ought to be considered as the real truth is, that the education of a sensible and intelligent man continues to the last day of his existence, and that, from the first day in a man's life, to time of existence, in which, if his mind is alive, if he keeps his ears and eyes open to impressions, and his observation, he will be unusually adding to the stock of his ideas and thoughts, and in which he will not add to the stock of his knowledge, he will be unconsciously making it useful to him both here and hereafter. But we are talking now about that education which you are going to pass when they have reached that age, and when he attain they can have when they engage in the pursuits of life; and let me not look at all by the observations which I am about to make to you as to think that the omissions of to-day—the omissions of your youth—can be made up by exertions in after years, and by a limited sense, which I have used, diminish that friendly feeling which ought to prevail between kindred races, as they are—I say, hoping that, we may fairly congratulate ourselves that there is no misunderstanding, and that there is no cause for it, and that we have political or commercial intercourse, with whom we are not on upon terms of the most satisfactory friendship. And long may that continue. I am persuaded that, let what political party may be charged with the government of this country, so long as they pursue that course which is most consistent with the maintenance of peace and the assertion of the rights and dignity of the country, this party will be backed by the hearty support of the nation; and the statesmen, be they whom they may, by whom the helm of policy is guided, will, when they come to address their fellow-citizens, receive from all political parties the same cordial recognition of what have been honourable services while holding office, again to thank you from the bottom of my heart for the kindness of your welcome, which has been the manifestation of the worth and cordiality of the Scottish character; although, indeed, from having passed three years, or, at least, a portion of my life, in studying at your schools, the cavity of Edinburgh, I have had some slight knowledge of the warm-hearted character of you all, and most gratefully do I receive the present specimen which you have given me of it, by the rec ption you have accorded to me to-night; and I can assure you that, during the short length of life that may be conceded to me, I shall never forget the kindness of my life, that I friends; and shall always look back to the period when I received honours have been honoured by being one of your fellow-citizens. I thank you again for the kindness you have manifested to me, and I have had the honour of addressing.

The noble Lord resumed his seat amidst loud cheers.

Various other toasts were proposed, and the company separated.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

The chief attraction at Trafalgar-square was afforded by an elaborate design at the National Gallery. In the centre was a transparency, representing two medallion portraits of the Prince and Princess, and two guardian angels crowning them with wreaths. A line of gas jets ran along the frieze, inclosing a St. George's star in crystal glass. There was a groundwork of beautiful crystal glass, above which were the words, "Long Life to the Prince and Princess of Wales!" "England's Hope!" On one side was placed on a shield the arms of England, draped by the national flags, while a corresponding shield bore the arms of Denmark, with the Dannebrog, Brunswick stars, and Prince's plume, with motto. The amber-coloured crystal glass, and the prismatic effects which it afforded, were most beautiful. The base, or groundwork, of amber crystal was 70 ft. long, and the whole design contained more than 2000 square feet of iron. Messrs. Defries executed this very creditable design, as well as those for the Treasury (of which we gave an Illustration last week) and for the War Office. The fountains in the square were illuminated by means of the electric light, which was also at intervals directed upon the Nelson Monument.

THE ADMIRALTY AND THE HORSE GUARDS.

The devices at the Admiralty consisted of the Prince of Wales's plume, 30 ft. in height, with two stars, 18 ft. in diameter, containing the Royal ciphers. The centre of each star was lighted by triple rows of gas jets, each row containing 236 jets. The rays from each star were of great length, and many thousands of jets were employed in the whole design.

The Horse Guards displayed a Prince's plume surmounted by a star, the whole inclosed in a framework of lights running round the entire front of the building.

SOMERSET HOUSE AND KING'S COLLEGE.

The tout ensemble of Somerset House was one of the most striking in the metropolis. The illumination represented the Prince of Wales's feathers over the initials "A. A." in the centre of the building, and around each window was a row of gas jets, with a scroll of jets along the upper and lower cornices.

King's College displayed a very handsome device. Over the gateway were the words "God Save the Queen" in large characters. Over the side entrance were the monograms "A. E." and "A. C.," with wreaths and lines of jets, surmounted by the motto of the college, "Sancte et Sapienter," all in gas.

GUILDHALL.

At the Guildhall a very handsome Prince of Wales's feather, with motto, was displayed, surmounted by a large star, and an aurora springing from the top of the pediment, all in gas. The insignia of the Corporation, forming part of the architectural decorations, were brought into strong relief, and the volutes of the columns, with every other point of the building, were illuminated, even to the very pinnacles.

THE EXCHANGE.

The Exchange was probably the most tasteful and successful effort to be seen in the City. Its pediment was traced with a line of light, and its columns twined by thousands of small oil lamps of various colours. The bold inscription, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof," was on this occasion spelt in literally fiery characters. The means of lighting employed throughout were oil lamps, and nothing could be more satisfactory than the soft, calm, almost religious effect which they produced.

MR. POOLE'S, SAVILE-ROW.

In Bond-street, Albemarle-street, and Savile-row, the illuminations were on a varied and brilliant scale. But by far the most costly and magnificent device was that exhibited by Mr. Poole, of Savile-row, clothier to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. It consisted of two Corinthian columns, an open elliptic arch, with the motto "God bless them," surmounted by the Prince of Wales's plume and motto, with two crystal stars. In the centre was a raised Holbein shield, with the arms of England and Denmark, the Imperial crown, and wreaths of laurel, the whole being in coloured and brilliant drops of crystal, of which there must have been many thousands. The effect was lustrous and brilliant in the highest degree.

THE GREAT BONFIRE AND DISPLAY OF FIREWORKS ON HAMPSTEAD HEATH.

At half-past seven p.m. on the 10th, an exceedingly effective display of fireworks commenced from the high ridge known as the Spaniards-road, and one hour afterwards the bonfire, which for days previously had been the subject of constant discussion in the neighbourhood, was lighted. Composed of a framework of massive trees, piled together in a pyramidal form, and surmounted by stages upon which, and also at the base, were piled great numbers of tar and sugar barrels, faggots, coals, and other combustibles, it soon began to light up the adjacent country; and as tree and path, mound and pool, grew as it were out of the darkness, the effect was weird in the extreme. The spot selected was the most lofty point of the Heath, to the left of the road leading to Highgate and in the immediate vicinity of the well-known "Jack Straw's Castle." We believe that Sir Thomas Wilson, the Lord of the Manor, afforded every facility, and that at his suggestion the pile was so arranged as to be within sight of Windsor Castle, twenty miles off. It is, however, extremely doubtful if the fire could be observed at such a distance, as the state of the atmosphere was by no means favourable. Thousands, notwithstanding the great attractions of the metropolis on the evening of the 10th, flocked to the spot, and shouted and danced round the crackling heap in a manner perfectly in keeping with the strange and fantastic scene. There was a torchlight procession, aided by very good music, and the whole passed off with the utmost success.

It may be observed that not only by such means as the above the inhabitants of this suburb testified their devotion to the Throne, but that much trouble and no little cost were freely expended in making many an untrodden nook amid the recesses and bypaths of its old-fashioned buildings gay with flag and wreath; while at night the generality of the illuminations was surprising, and afforded unmistakable proof of the deepseated loyalty which pervades all classes of her Majesty's subjects. Much credit is due also to those who undertook the immediate superintendence of the display depicted in our Engraving.

REJOICINGS IN THE PROVINCES.

ST. PHILIP'S CHURCH, BIRMINGHAM, ILLUMINATED.

Our Engraving represents the illumination of St. Philip's Church, Birmingham, on the evening of the marriage of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Situated in the centre and upon the most elevated ground in Birmingham, St. Philip's measures upwards of 170 ft. from the base to the summit of the cross. The design for the illumination—furnished by Mr. Peter Hollins, sculptor, and executed by Messrs. Russel and Sons, Crown Works, Wednesbury—consisted of gas-tubing intended to run parallel to the principal lines of architecture from the base to the summit, pierced at distances of 3 in. or 5 in., and fitted with batswing burners. About 10,000 of these burners were used in the illumination, all of which were screwed on after the pipes had been fitted to the church. The service-pipes employed varied in diameter from three inches to three-quarters of an inch, and would have measured in a straight line about three-quarters of a mile.

CHELSEA BUNS.

A CHELSEA bun has become a greater rarity than a Chelsea teacup; but we are old enough to remember a quarter of a million of buns being sold at the Old Chelsea Bun House on a good Friday morning. A hundred and fifty years ago Dean Swift sat down, in his "Journal to Stella," that in his walk he had bought "one of the rare Chelsea buns." To return to our own times,—we remember "the Old Original Chelsea Bun House," in Jews'-row, a one-storied building, projecting over the foot-pavement, taken down three-and-twenty years ago. This place had its little history and its museum as well as its buns; for here were preserved mementoes of the first half of the past century. The Royal Family were exhibited in a few of the rooms; here were the portraits of Duke Wilhelm, and other noted personages; a model of a British soldier in the stiff costume of the same age; and some grotesque works more than to the taste of a refined period were, perhaps, intended to rival the neighbouring exhibition at Don Saltero's. Among the Old Bun House curiosities, Richard Hodge, fifty years ago, used to boast that George II., Queen Caroline, and the Princesses, at whose request he was honoured with the Royal Visit when Prince George, and often during his reign, had stopped and purchased his buns; and that Queen Charlotte, the Princess Royal, Princesses, and many other distinguished customers; indeed, the Queen presented Mrs. Hands with a silver half-pallon mug, with five guineas in it, in testimony of her patronage of the buns for the sake of which afforded a competency, and even wealth, to four generations of the same family. "It is singular," he says, "that since 1817, 'that the delicate flavour, lightness, and richness of these buns have never been successfully imitated." Then, how the hungry customers used to flock from Sandaigh to Kings-road upon the hour; this trade was so extensive that, from the closing of Ranelagh, in 1804, the cries and full of the buns were heard in Sloane-street. On Good Friday mornings, upwards of 50,000 persons have assembled, and in one night of 1809, 2,300 hats have been taken for buns: then the carriages for the buns disturbances often arose. It has been asked, we do not say unreasonably, "Why do summer roses fade?"—parity, Why are not Chelsea buns the same? Does not the grower of roses, and the chelsea bun-maker be usurped by overbaked saffron or turmeric hued bits of dough, or unwholesome cakes in the same street but spurious Chelsea buns of this day? The Bun House was one of the institutions of the place, which we have seen pass away, and all the Chelsea custards and china; indeed, the bun is about as great a rarity as the Egyptian cakes in the British Museum, or the loaves in the baker's shop Nineveh, or other day at Pompeii.

HOW THE GREAT MANSION HOUSE FASTER DINNER GREW.

This time-honoured festivity originated in the Spiral sermons that were established by Sir Paul Pindar, in the year 1618, and called the Spital, on Good Friday, and on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday following. At these sermons the Lord Mayor and Aldermen attended, habit-clad, and they, for the most part, in the grossest manner, and at the close of each day's solemnity he Lordship and the Sheriffs gave a private dinner to several friends among the Aldermen who so attended the sermon. From this practice the civic festivities at Easter arose, but extended to the present magnificent scale on Easter Monday at the Mansion House.

THE COMMON HUNT.

What has become of the Common Hunt of the city of London, which dated from the charter granted by Henry I. to the citizens to "have chaces and bears, and as their fathers before them have had"—that is to say, in the Chiltre, in Middlesex, and Surrey? Fitzstephen says: Henry II. "in the Summer delight themselves with bowes and hounds; for they have the liberty of hunting in Middlesex, Hertfordshire, all Chiltern, and in Kent to the waters of Grey," which differs somewhat from the charter. These exercises were all followed much by the citizens of London at the close of the eighteenth century, but Strutt tells us that, so late as the reign of George I., among the modern amusements of the Londoners were "riding on horseback and hunting with my Lord Mayor's hounds when the season (viz. Sept.) will permit." The ordinary of Newgate was a cry for a stage, and at length the hounds killed him at the end of St Giles's, great hallooing of the people, and blowing of horns." The hunting-meeting-days, wherein the Mayor and Corporation dined, were built upon a spot, now the end of Stratford-place, Oxford-street. It was taken down in 1737, and the site leased by the Corporation to Edward Stratford, Earl of Aldborough, and others, the ground lease renewable for ever. A new mansion was built upon the site of the hunting-house, because the Earl of Aldborough resided for many years. The Common Hunt is still part of the Lord Mayor's household; surely, the dis-affecting of Middlesex and Surrey from the chase is decisive.

ART-RARITIES. At the sale of the Dowager Lady Ashburnham's collection on the 26th and 27th ult. were sold three historic items:—1. A beautiful watch, by the celebrated master Le Pine, in a gold case richly incrusted with flowers in agate, and a trophy in agate; cameo in relief, inscribed "I'Amitié," with chain, two seals, and key complete, the whole incrusted with agate and other precious materials, and with emblems in cameo, inscribed "Tendre, Fidèle, Ardent, Sincère, Secret, Constant, Unis pour toujours." This watch was formerly the property of Louis XIV. It is in a handsome case of the period, and sold for the large sum of £155. 2. A triangular salt-cellar, of marble, supported on three figures of boys blowing serpents, and standing on dolphins, with a vase beneath, the centre closed with masks and fruits; above is an obelisk engraved with masks and flowers, surmounted by dolphins and a shell; and on the angles are three grouse blowing horns; the whole of the finest cinque-cento work, attributed to Cellini. 70 guineas. 3. The celebrated cup, formed of old turquoise celadon porcelain, mounted with head-draperies of emerald, and the Memoirs of the Duchess of Orleans carved in pearl and diamonds to the value of 150,000f. suspended from them, on which are two cherubs and wreaths of roses have been added to the mounting. This magnificent group brought 350 guineas.

FIG SUNDAY is the popular name for the Sunday before Easter, it is thought in allusion to our Saviour's desire to eat the fruit of the fig-tree on his way from Bethany on the Monday following. Hence, in such parts of England, rich and poor eat figs on this day. Miss Baker, in her "Northamptonshire Glossary," 1854, states that on "Fig Sunday or Fig Sunday" the market at Northampton is abundantly supplied with figs, and there are more purchased at this time than throughout the rest of the year; even the charity children in some places are regaled with them." Hone, in his "Every-Day," states it had long been the custom for the inhabitants to eat figs on this day, at Sompting, in Hertfordshire, where they keep warm and made merry; and we remember the observance as common in the same county, at Hemel Hempstead, some twenty years before Hone wrote.

THE DUTCH CHURCH, AUSTINFRIARS.—A sad scene of dereliction is presented at this moment by the church, or, rather, the remains of the church, of the Monastery of Augustine Friars, in Broad-street Ward. Its mutilations date from the time when Edward VI. granted the building to the Marquis of Winchester, who they extended to the recent fire by which the roof of the church was almost entirely consumed. Through the noble decorated windows hosts of fragments fell of the destruction of the interior. The monto of the large sun-dial, "Docet Umbra," is very suggestive of the hasty-pudding and Chelsea-bun-consuming public, who have by no one recorded to be, as it has been for more than three centuries, the "great-bing-place of the Dutch nation in London." To the arches abovesaid this spot, and the adjoining Winchester-street, with its old gabled houses, form one of the most interesting nooks of the City.

THE PARTITION OF POLAND.—Some twenty years before the dismemberment of Poland, this disgraceful act was foretold by Lord Chesterfield, in Letter CCCIV., dated Dec. 25, 1753, commencing with "The first sensible act in Europe that I foresee will be the cutting up of Poland." The leading data of the fall of Poland will show how this prediction was fulfilled. In 1772 the Empress of Russia, the Emperor of Germany, the Empress of Russia, and the King of Prussia, who seized the most valuable territories in 1772. The Royal and Imperial robbers, on receiving the ransom, withdrew their armies into the country in 1792. The brave Poles, under Poniatowski and Kosciusko, for a time contended against superior numbers, but in the end were defeated. Then followed the battle of Warsaw, Oct. 13, 1794, and the survivors a butcher's bill of 13,000 Poles of all ages and classes, in cold blood. We can scarcely believe such wholesale atrocities to have been perpetrated upon European soil within seventy years of the time when Lord Chesterfield wrote. The Polish parliament and its political existence annihilated in 1795. The transaction, in its earlier stages, dates from 1768. Dies of 1772, 1793, 1772, and 1773, supposed to have been written by Edmund Burke. Professor Smythe says, diffidently . . . After all, the authorship of that work such as must be afford an exception (perhaps a single exception) in the history of mankind to those general rules of justice that are so essential to the peace and happiness of society. . . . I observe this great hesitation, and you must consider the point yourselves; I do not profess to be fully competent to understand it. . . . [See Lecky's "History of Rationalism." Sir James Macintosh contributed to the Edinburgh Review a valuable paper on Poland.

BRONZE OF THE ROMANS.—The Abbé Cochet states, in a letter to the French journals, that hatchets are found almost all over Europe. They are common in France, and are generally found in groups. Some are of pure bronze, and others of copper. Dies are frequently found in parts of tin and eight-six of copper. The bronze is the same as that of an axe-head found in Denmark from Thomsen's museum by Vasquein, from which it would appear that the composition of ancient Gallic bronze came from Egypt. Archæologists generally attribute these axes to the Celts and Gauls, and give them the general name of Celtic.

DIEU ET NON DROIT.—The earliest notice that has been found of the King's present motto, "Dieu et non Droit," is in the 13th Henry VI., 1435, when a gown, embroidered with silver crowns, and the motto, "Dieu et non Droit," is described in a roll in Carlton-ride.—Sir Harris Nicolas; "Archæologia," vol. xxxi.

THE EXECUTIONER OF CHARLES I.—There has lately been found in the parish register of St. Michael's Town, Barbadoes, stating that one Hugh Peasball, after living in the island almost twenty years, died there, having on his deathbed confessed that he was the person pit out of the head of King Charles, for which he had £100." We do not attach much credit to this story, but it is not enough to conclude without such the evidence in the parish register of St. Mary Matfelon, Whitechapel, that Hugh Peasball, &c.; and the statement of Dion Boucicault in a roll in Carlton-ride.—Sir Harris Nicolas; "Archæologia," vol. xxxi.

ANCIENT HOLDINGS IN HAMPSHIRE.—The Marquis of Winchester and Lord Rolton, the descendants of Hugh Part, still hold lands in Hampshire, which have been in the family since the time they were granted by the Crown, by which also the present High Sheriff, Sir St. John Mildmay, Bart., of Dogmersfield Park, Hants, is in the possession of the Oglanders, the first of whom, Richard de Oglander, came over with William I. from Caen, and reduced the Isle of Wight.

LONDON AND MIDDLESEX ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—A useful rend to the London and Middlesex and Surrey Archæological Societies an interesting paper on "Inedited London Tokens," illustrated by a series of admirable woodcuts. The paper was communicated by Mr. Overall first traced the history of this small coinage from its earliest to London, whence, in consequence of the scarcity, to other towns and among traders. He next referred to the principal signs on tokens, mostly originating from the badges of various houses or factions, the arms of various companies, &c. The numerous signs of the Bull and Mouth, black bulls, golden fleeces, &c.; the white hart of Richard II.; the white swan of the Tudors; the Bell Savage, and the Royal Oak of the Tudor family. Frequently, signs refer to agricultural or animal occupations, as the Bull and Mouth, which was said to have been derived from the barley- and tipping-houses was most frequent; but every trade, with one exception, the bookseller, used them. On some were articles of trade, as the Three Cups, Vintners' Arms; the Three Compasses, Compasses, Mathematical Instrument Maker's Arms; the Three Squirrels, Furriers' Arms; the Three Tuns, Coopers' Arms; the Three Crowns, Sugar-loaves, &c. Some of the specimens exhibited were remarkable for their extreme rudeness, and were accompanied in published cut-leaves—abridged from the City Press.

ANCIENT RURAL POLICE.—In a very interesting paper in the Law Magazine, No. 28, on "The Rights, Disabilities, and Usages of the Ancient English Peasantry," Mr. Brand, the well-known antiquary, says that during the Saxon period, and for several centuries since, the duty of ward-keeping was performed by wardmen, who were a kind of rural police. The wardmen, who had authority over the north side of London (then a forestal country), until the institution of the present system of police in the reign of Edward I., the gate of Wilston it was ordered that it should be kept by six men at each gate of a city, by twelve men in every borough, and by six men and four men in every burgh township, every day from the Feast of the Ascension of our Lord to the Feast of St. Nicholas. The watchman could detain "all suspicious persons," and if he who waited at night in the King's highway and received the wardstaff:

> They cared and they waked,
> And the ward was kept,
> That the King was harmless,
> And the people rested.

In Essex the wardkeeper had a rope with a bell, or more than one bell, attached to it, which he made use of when he went his rounds. The wardstaff was a type of authority, out and carried with peculiar ceremony, and treated with great reverence.

THE DEATH OF ATTILA.—One of the mysteries of Old Pall-mall late in the last century was earth-bathing, which the notorious quack, Dr. Graham, recommended for the cure of certain diseases, and underlook to ascertain by his own practice. During one hot every day he admitted spectators, first at a guinea and subsequently at one shilling each, into a room in the basement of his house, where he stripped of thirty pence paid a penny at Martinmas, called ward-penny; but this was abolished by Edward III. Sailors and men of the navy were also wardmen; but in the residue of the day very uncertain and unstable, and much given to excessive sulping and surfeiting. And, albeit he had most commonly two hundred tuns of wines in his cellar at Dundrum, and had his full fill thereof, yet was he never satisfied till he had swallowed up marvellous great quantities of unquetsgh, or aqua vitæ of that country; whereof so unmeasurably he would drink and tosse, that for the quenching of the heat of the body, which by that means was most extremey inflamed and distempered, he was accustomed every day to have certain report vessels of water full standing upright in the same, the earth was cast round about him in the bed, and he himself did stare his head uppermost, that his body was covered to some temperature."—Retrospect, vol. iv., p. 361.

MUSIC.

The second concert of the VOCAL ASSOCIATION, on Friday evening, the 27th ult., at St. James's Hall, was an entertainment of a miscellaneous character. Its most remarkable feature was a new cantata, by Miss Virginia Gabriel, a young lady who has acquired no small reputation as an amateur composer. Her very elegant vocal pieces have been repeatedly encored in our columns, and this, her last and most ambitious work, will add new honour to her name. It is entitled "Dreamland." The libretto, by Mr. Oxenford, is imaginative and poetical, the subject being the dreams of a young English exile, in which memories of the past, fancies of the present, and glimpses of the future, and aspirations of the future pass through the mind of the dreamer. The music consists chiefly of airs intermixed with a few choruses. It is not striking or original—but—there is a quality rarer than that which it betrays no palpable plagiarisms, while it is evidently the work of one who is familiar with the best models, and imbued with the principles and style of the greatest masters. The solo parts were well sung by Midle. Rosza, Mr. Lawler, Mr. Weiss, Signor, and Mr. Wilbye; while the execution of the choruses by the members of the Vocal Association was careful and effective. The whole performance was most warmly received, and the last movement was loudly called for by Mr. Benedict to acknowledge the applause most justly bestowed on her work. The remainder of the concert was made up of well-known part-songs, a trio by the above-named singers, and solos on the violoncello and the pianoforte by M. Paque and Midlle. Mehlig. Madame Teresa Titiens, a contralto from the Imperial Theatre of Vienna, made her first appearance before an English audience. She has a rich voice, with a pure and cultivated style, and deserved her favourable reception.

The first public concert this season of the pupils of the ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC was given at the Hanover-square Rooms on Saturday last, the 28th ult., under the direction of Mr. Charles Lucas, the principal of the Academy. The vocal music was entirely sacred. The most remarkable novelty was a motett, "The Thirty-third Psalm," composed by Dr. Steggall, formerly a student of the academy, and now a professor of distinguished talent. The psalm—a choral work, intermixed with solos—was well performed and well received. The other vocal pieces were selected from the sacred works of Handel, Beethoven, Mozart, and Rossini; the principal singers being Miss Westbrook, Miss Hodgson, Miss Upton, Miss Wicums, Miss Hall, Mr. Wells, and Mr. Lawler. Mr. Lucas on the piano was played by Miss Williams (daughter of the distinguished performer on the clarinet), a young lady who promises to be a performer of the first class; and Mr. Nicholson (son of an eminent violinist of Edinburgh) performed a solo on the violin in a manner which gave high promise of excellence. Altogether, this concert was honourable to the academy, both teachers and pupils.

We learn that Mlme. LEMMENS-SHERRINGTON will arrive in London for the season on the 8th of April (Friday next). This distinguished lady, so deservedly a favourite of the English public, has been fulfilling a series of engagements at Berlin, and Madrid, attended with extraordinary success. At the grand Musical Festival in Cologne, in particular, her appearance excited the enthusiasm of the public, and received the most flattering eulogies from the journals of that city, one of which, speaking of the singular clearness and purity of her voice, says that she "really called her 'The Italian Sontag.' She has been singing, too, at Amsterdam, Rotterdam, the Hague, &c.; and everywhere her success has been equally triumphant.

The TRIENNIAL MEETING OF THE THREE CHOIRS will take place at Worcester in September next, and the preparatory arrangements are already in a state of forwardness. The following vocal performers are engaged:—Mlmes. Titiens, Lemmens-Sherrington, Rudersdorf, Dolby, and Lascelles; Mdlle. Rose Berry, Wilbye Cooper, Weiss, and Santley.

We learn that in the course of the season three performances are to be given at Her Majesty's Theatre in behalf of Mr. LUMLEY, and as a testimonial to his great merits as the lessee of that theatre; Mr. Mapleson, the present lessee of Drury Lane, having generously consurrence, and placed the theatre at the disposal of the promoters of the measure.

Mdme. ARABELLA GODDARD (or rather Mrs. J. W. Davison), who has been suffering from indisposition, is at present on a visit to Glasgow, whence, we hope, she will return to her professional labours with renewed health and vigour.

BENEDICT'S favourite opera, "The Lily of Killarney," in a German version, under the title of "Die Rose von Killarney," was played at Stuttgard, the composer's native city, on the 6th of March (the day on which Weber's birth-day was given direction. It is pleasant that a prophet is not honoured in his own country, did not hold good on this occasion, for the Stuttgardters are proud of their townsman, and were eager to do him honour on the first occasion of his visit to present day. The Stuttgardt journals contain able critiques on the opera and its performance.

The directorship of the PARIS THEATRE ITALIEN, vacant by the dismissal of M. Calzado, of card-cheating notoriety, has been given by the Government to M. Bagier, who has been the manager of the Italian Opera of Madrid. M. Bagier has agreed to give up the "subvention" of 100,000 francs which the Italian Theatre has hitherto received from the State—a thing which our Mr. Lumley (who was one of the candidates) declined to do. M. Bagier, however, has insisted on several new conditions. The first is that the Grand Opera is to have right of applying off a successful performer from the Italian stage; and, if the Grand Opera translates and brings out an Italian opera, a similar right is did in the case of the "Trovatore"), the Théâtre Italien is to be entitled to select an equivalent work. The third is that the Grand Opera

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'.—On Thursday week an amateur performance by the members of the Queen's Rifle Corps (Westminster) took place at this theatre, under the patronage of Lord Elcho, Lieut.-Col. R.E., and Lord Gerald Fitzgerald. The pieces were "Friends or Foes" and "Mischief Misplaced." The "Grand Duke" is the production by Messrs. Reynolds and Draper, which, in acting, "came out" very effectively. Another new piece was brought forward on the same occasion, "Misplaced Affections," and written by Private Draper, which proved very amusing. Between the first two pieces Miss Amy Sedgwick rendered several pieces written by Miss Frewell, which told well with the audience, and was delivered in capital style by the gentlemen actors. On Saturday Miss Sedgwick took her benefit, as Pauline, in "The Lady of Lyons," and was well received. It was also the last night of Mr. Charles Kean's season, closed with Master Dudley, when it will reopen with a new burlesque by Mr. Byron.

Other theatres have been closed during Passion Week. Among these, the Royal Westminster, Drury Lane, and the Lyceum. Of those that have remained open, we may mention Sadler's Wells, the New Adelphi, the St. James's, the Olympic, the Strand, the City of London, and the Standard. The Haymarket closed on Wednesday with Mr. Sothern's benefit.

The Council of the Society of Arts have appointed a committee to consider and report what steps may be offered by them for practical suggestions to improve street illuminations and street decorations for fêtes.

POST OFFICE ARRANGEMENTS.—A notice issued by the Postmaster-General states that the British rate of postage upon letters addressed for British packet between the United Kingdom and Mexico, Cuba, and Porto Rico, is reduced to one shilling for a letter not exceeding half an ounce in weight, increasing at the rate of one shilling for each additional half ounce. Postage upon letters for the same destinations from all other parts of America—Jamaica alone excepted—is reduced from 2s. to 1s. 6d. the half ounce. The reason assigned is that the revenue derived from the present rate of postage is so large that it has been found to be totally insufficient to cover the expenses of the packet service.

THE TAEPINGS AND THE TARTARS.

The revolution now in progress in China is one of the most remarkable that this revolutionary age... It nearly concerns the Western nations to observe it with attention, for it is the first great popular movement in that self-centred and self-opinionated nation which unquestionably owes its inspiration to the action of European civilisation upon the Chinese mind. In its political phase it is attributed on all hands to the weakening of the Imperial Government by the British forces, and in its religious phase it is the direct offshoot of the teachings of British and American missionaries and their native helpers. One of the considerations which Lord Palmerston relied on in defence of the high-handed policy he has always pursued in regard to the Chinese Government was that it was the representative of an alien race, and that its subjects were disaffected to its rule, and were combined in secret societies to resist and, if possible, to overthrow it. The fruits of this policy were not slow to manifest themselves. The Chinese insisted that the Emperor's exchequer, like the Hungarian, should bear all the cost of the troops whom they saw always in flight. These conspiracies became at first local revolts, and afterwards, under the Taeping leaders, a formidable national movement, which has now arrived in behalf of national independence and a new native Chinese dynasty. The disappointed candidate for a Government appointment at Canton, Hung-Siu-tsuen, who is now the Taeping Emperor at Nankin, commenced an overt resistance to the legitimate Government in the latter part of 1850, in the two south-eastern provinces of China, where the sentiment of hostility to the conquering race has always been most lively. Proceeding northward, he and his followers, being (wange) captured Nankin, which they made their capital in March, 1853, and here they have maintained themselves until the present moment. In its political aspect the Taeping revolution can allege in its own justification that principle of "nationality" which we see so well understood in Europe, and which the Poles are now invoking against Muscovite domination; while there is surprising unanimity in the character of the Pekin Government and the Mandarin Tartars in their hostile feeling to the esteem and sympathy of the civilised world.

In its religious aspect, again, there was nothing in the Taeping propaganda which need have provoked the hostility of the Protestant nations at least. Hung-shu-tsuen has more than one of the attributes of living Wrangy, have enjoyed the benefit of personal intercourse with and instruction from the British and American Protestant missionaries at Canton and Hong-Kong. The chief of the revolt is not "the Chinese shippers" in Kwang-tung and Kwang-si was, originally, an attempt to Christianise the Chinese, and received the active support and assistance from Protestant missionaries of all denominations. By assuming a close relationship with Jehovah, Jesus, and the Holy Ghost, he assumed a close relationship with the Bible, and with the Christian and Protestant Bible. Doubtless the Taeping Emperor has many essential errors of faith and of his missionary friends. Still the religious institutions of the Taepings retain a strong leaven of Christianity and Judaism. Nankin, indeed, has republished the Septuagint version of the Pentateuch and the New Testament, has set apart the Jewish Sabbath for the day of rest and worship, and has adopted the Ten Wars and expeditions, finds time to impart so much systematic instruction on religious matters that our interpreters in the north of China found the conversation of the Taeping armies able to repeat the ten commandments, and the leaders more anxious to exchange ideas on theological subjects than on political and commercial affairs. Above all, the Taeping leaders assiduously inculcate the doctrine that all Christians, whether Catholics or Protestants (for they are equally ignorant of the differences between them), are their brothers, and have one and the same religious aims with themselves. Apart from this common religion, which, if it does not constitute a common one, is an extirpator of the Buddhist and Taouist superstitions, is entitled to claim at once the liberality of judgment which has been so generously conceded to Mohammedanism as the destroyer of those idolatries of Asia and Africa which Christianity had suffered to overspread and had not succeeded in uprooting.

Here, then, was another case of a conflict between a Government and the people which afforded a most excellent opportunity for the application of the principle of non-intervention which the English people advocated so strongly in the case of Poland. But in China, as in oppressed nationalities, and which they religiously respect in America out of regard for the inherent rights of nations, we have seen that the attitude of the British Government and its diplomatic agents in China was until lately in harmony with this principle. Sir George Bonham, on the 29th April 30, 1853, wrote as follows to the Taeping leaders:—"Certain of the Manchou authorities had issued a proclamation to the effect that they had borrowed the arms and ships of the more steamers of Western nations which would proceed up the Yang-tsze to attack your forces. This is altogether untrue. It is the established custom of our nation in no case to interfere with any contests that may take place in the countries frequented by our subjects for commercial purposes: it is, therefore, usual on the part of those that we should now in China lend the services of our steamers to give assistance in shipping. Eight years afterwards Earl Russell, in a despatch to Mr. Bruce, dated Aug. 8, 1861, gives the following instructions:—"Her Majesty's Government desire to maintain, as they have already done, neutrality between the two contending parties in China: if British subjects are taken prisoners by either party you should apply to your utmost to obtain their release from all punishment, but otherwise you should abstain from all interference in the civil war."

On the 7th of September of the same year Earl Russell repeats these orders, but in the following passage opens the door to that British diplomatist in China found means to escape altogether from the line of duty laid down for them by the noble Lord:—"I have to state to you that Her Majesty's Government agree with the opinion which you in regard to an attack upon Nankin as highly impolitic, but it might be expedient for the British treaty ports, if the Chinese authorities were not to use those ports for purposes of aggression."

Let us now see how it happened that the Manchous were able to rally to their side the powerful European support which is now thronging to their standard. The first to enlist in their cause was the late Colonel Staveley, of Bombay, who was slightly wounded in the Nicaragua campaigns of General William Walker. This filibuster, whose "organisation" in China was vouched for by Lord Palmerston, must have undergone a radical change of character since his migration to Chinese waters; for in America Walker's understrappers were deemed a dangerous and unscrupulous class of men by persons who had any reputation of their own. Colonel Ward has recently been succeeded by Colonel Gordon, another ex-Crimean officer, who appears to prefer the service of Prince Kung to that of Jefferson Davis. In consequence of a little "difficulty" between Colonel Staveley and the foreigners, they have already dismissed him and set a price upon his head. Captain Holland, of her Majesty's Light Marines, has succeeded to the command of Ward's body of "disciplined Chinese." But the Tartar officials, desirating the "rowdyism" and mistrusting the fidelity of such mercenaries as would accept an English officer, have selected Captain Holland to the orders and surveillance of a native superior.

The next allies of the Tartars were the French, who have always displayed great aversion to the Taepings. Now, the French officials at home and in China do not conceal the motives which induce them to intervene. They boast that they are fighting for an "idea," and that opinion in Europe, which is called by them the public opinion, is ambition for territorial aggrandisement which actuates Russia. What is this "?" Commander Lindesay Brine, in his recent valuable work on "The Taeping Rebellion in China," has given the exact tenets of French hostility to the Taepings:—

"With the Roman Church their creed is so thoroughly irreconcilable that no greater disaster could happen to its missions than the success of the Hung-ste-ouen. The Taeping religion presents so many points of similarity with that of Buddhism as followed in China, particularly in the external ceremonials, the system of priesthood, and the homage to idols, that, should it ever be the domestic tenenos of the Taepings obtain full sway, these, together with their known fanatical hatred to all Buddhist priests, would lead to this result—viz., that every vestige of Roman Catholicism would be swept from the empire. The Catholics full well comprehend this, and by no people are the Taepings so much hated as by the French. Were it in their power, they would crush this rebellion with the deepest gratification."

The co-operation of England and France in any laudable and honourable enterprise, such as that which took their armies to the north to the Black Sea, is an object highly to be desired; but the truest friends of a permanent Anglo-French alliance are not those who desire to see that beneficent policy stained and discredited by a joint participation in wrongdoing; and assuredly the crusading zeal of our Gallic neighbours in behalf of mago-worship will not find many sympathisers on the side of the Channel.

But the magnates of French example would not have been powerful enough to make us partners from our settled policy of non-intervention had not other influences combined to urge our Government on a career which it had not originally contemplated. If the French hated the Taepings for their iconoclasticism, the British merchants hated them for their rigorous and effective prohibition of the sale and consumption of the demoralising drug. From this sentiment moral life awakened by this great uprising, the stronger hold which the Taepings have on the people must have always existed. The Tartar sanctions a system of corruption in the lower classes of society, which the Chinese have not attempted to disturb even in the la Sainte fabrique of the elder mandarin Government were contemptible in the extreme. But war was the only section of the Anglo-Chinese community who set themselves to work to make difficulties with the Taepings. The Tartar is exchequer like the Hungarian; troops whom they saw always in flight. Their conspiracies became at first local revolts, and afterwards, under the Taeping leaders, a formidable national movement, which has now arrived in behalf of national independence and a new native Chinese dynasty. The disappointed candidate for a Government appointment at Canton, Hung-Siu-tsuen, who is now the Taeping Emperor at Nankin, commenced an overt resistance to the legitimate Government in the latter part of 1850, in the two south-eastern provinces of China, where the sentiment of hostility to the conquering race has always been most lively. Proceeding northward, he and his followers, being (wange) captured Nankin, which they made their capital in March, 1853, and here they have maintained themselves until the present moment. In its political phase the Taeping revolution can allege in its own justification that principle of "nationality" which we see so well understood in Europe, and which the Poles are now invoking against Muscovite domination; while there is surprising unanimity in the character of the Pekin Government and the Mandarin Tartars in their hostile feeling to the esteem and sympathy of the civilised world.

In its religious aspect, again, there was nothing in the Taeping propaganda which need have provoked the hostility of the Protestant nations at least. Hung-shu-tsuen has more than one of the attributes of living Wrangy, have enjoyed the benefit of personal intercourse with and instruction from the British and American Protestant missionaries at Canton and Hong-Kong. The chief of the revolt is not "the Chinese shippers" in Kwang-tung and Kwang-si was, originally, an attempt to Christianise the Chinese, and received the active support and assistance from Protestant missionaries of all denominations. By assuming a close relationship with Jehovah, Jesus, and the Holy Ghost, he assumed a close relationship with the Bible, and with the Christian and Protestant Bible. Doubtless the Taeping Emperor has many essential errors of faith and of his missionary friends. Still the religious institutions of the Taepings retain a strong leaven of Christianity and Judaism. Nankin, indeed, has republished the Septuagint version of the Pentateuch and the New Testament, has set apart the Jewish Sabbath for the day of rest and worship, and has adopted the Ten Wars and expeditions, finds time to impart so much systematic instruction on religious matters that our interpreters in the north of China found the conversation of the Taeping armies able to repeat the ten commandments, and the leaders more anxious to exchange ideas on theological subjects than on political and commercial affairs. THE THAMES EMBANKMENT, ON THE NORTH SIDE.

At the weekly meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works, held yesterday week, the following report upon the subject of the Thames embankment on the north side was brought on to the chief engineer, Mr. Bazalgette:—

"The first point to which my attention has been directed in preparing the designs for the Thames embankment is the depth and character of the requisite foundations, and the mode of constructing them and the embankment wall. In order to ascertain these points borings were made in the bed of the river, along the line of the face of the embankment, down to the London clay, the result of which I have carefully considered, and I have arrived at the opinion, and from these a long continuous section of the substratum of the river under the proposed embankment has been prepared. From this section it appears that, with some exceptions, indicated upon the section, the river mud and sand average about 17ft. in depth, and that it is best to go through this to the gravel, or, where the gravel is not found, to the London clay, and averaging from 1ft. to 2ft. in thickness, and to form a bed for the wall. The gravel lies at a depth of about 42 ft. below Trinity high-water mark. I am of opinion that a platform and solid foundations may be obtained at a much less depth than the lower portion of this bed of gravel, as a depth of about 14ft. below low-water mark will be sufficient for the clay or about the level of the bottom of the deep-water channel of the river in the mid-stream. In order to get to the foundations by the shortest and most economical means, I propose to make a connected line of iron caissons, and to fill them with Portland cement concrete to within 2ft. of low-water mark. This depth, and upon the concrete, will be built the brick granite-faced embankment wall. The caissons will be constructed of iron, and will be floated to their places, and sunk in the exact position as that line is marked out on shore, when the work can be carried on with perfect security and economical despatch. At each of the bridges there are and must be existing piers and abutments, and the space between the bridges there are landing-places of some description, which will have to be maintained. To meet these requirements it is proposed to construct the wall in compartments from bridge to bridge as a complete design, and to make the steam-boat and landing-places intermediate between the bridges as well as useful accessory features. At Westminster Bridge the road-way, which rises as an inclination of 1 in 80 from the Horse Guards to the bridge, is about 40 ft. or 50 ft. from the face of the embankment wall, and the intervening space would be covered as a steam-boat landing-place, having access from the bridge by a wide and imposing flight of steps opposite the Houses of Parliament. This will terminate within convenient sloping width of the embankment at this point. Between Westminster and Hungerford Bridges would be landing-places for steam-boats, which would be disposed to include the industrial water-gate now situated at the end of Buckingham-street, and erected after a design by Inigo Jones. Between Hungerford and Waterloo Bridges would be steam-boat landing-places, the dumbers for which would be partly occupied by the Charing-cross Railway Company, and on the vacant space a central line of embankment massive granite piers with moulded pedestals rising about 12 ft. above the roadway, and which would be connected by arches, and surmounted by groups of statuary. Half way between Hungerford and Waterloo Bridges it is proposed to construct a flight of steps 60 ft. wide, projecting into the river, and flanked at each end with massive piers rising to the level of the road-way, and terminating hereafter to be surmounted with colossal figures of river deities or other appropriate groups of statuary. It is proposed to form an approach for foot passengers from the high-level road-way to the river by a second flight of steps descending to the level of the lower or embankment road-way, and to construct such to the effect of this central feature as viewed from the river. On each side of these steps would be a landing-place, and on the vacant space at the embankment roadway, the backs of which would form a retaining wall to the ornamental recesses and steps, would be constructed a range of public lavatories. Blackfriars Bridge, and in front of Arundel-street, a steam-boat pier would be constructed. Between Blackfriars Bridge and Queen-street pier, diagonal, and the same principle as those adjoining the bridges. The embankment wall itself has been carefully considered, and will be constructed with a curve of high-water mark, the continuous line of moulding being broken by the introduction of the piers and steps, and of granite to carry ornamental lamps, and by occasional recesses for promenade seats. It is proposed, in the best manner, to construct the embankment wall of the Victoria Docks, at the level of 4ft. above Trinity high-water mark, and afterwards to arrange for the sewage of the north side of London, so as to intercept the whole of the sewers—the first from Westminster to Waterloo Bridge, which may be let before August next.

The report then proceeds to state that—

The Thames Embankment (South Side) Bill having been printed, the exact sense of the intended works on the south side of the river may now be understood. It is proposed by that Bill to make a road-way 1. An enlargement of the bed of the River Thames by an excavation of the land, and removal of the vaults and premises from or near Dumbeselley, near to the London Gasworks, to or near Broad-street, all in the parish of Lambeth. 2. A road-way on the north bank of the River Thames in the parish of St. Mary, Lambeth, commencing at or near Gunhouse-alley and ending at or near Bishop's-road, with convenient approaches and footpath walk in the parish of St. Mary, Lambeth, and ending at the southern side of the eastern abutment of Westminster Bridge. 4. A new street to wholly situate in the parish of Lambeth, commencing at or near the southern end of Hungerford-bridge, and terminating at or near Belvedere-road. 5. A street to be wholly situate in the parish of Lambeth commencing in and out of the road-way on the above-mentioned intended road-way, and terminating at or near Vauxhall-row. 6. The reclaiming or inclosing of a portion of the bed or foreshore of the River Thames.

A KEY TO THE PRONUNCIATION OF POLISH NAMES.

The vowels are sounded as in French and Italian; and there are no diphthongs, every vowel being pronounced separately. The chief consonants in Polish names are as follow:—

"W" is sounded like "v;" thus, Warszawa is pronounced Varshava, Gurowski as Gurovski.

"C" like "ts," and never like "k:" thus, Pac, Pats; Wysocki, Vysotski; Kostecki, Kotsetski.

"S" is always hard.

"Ch" is like a strong aspirate, or the German "ch."

"Cz," "Sz," "Rz," thus, Czaroyski is pronounced Tcharoryski; Laniewicz as Lanyiewitch.

"Ś," "Ć," "Ź," "Dź," thus, Śmigły is sounded like Stsmitch.

"Ł" like "w;" thus, Czerwiakiewicz pronounce Tcherviakiewicz.

"Sz" like "sh;" thus, Szczerbic as Shtcherbitch.

"Ń" like "ni" as sounded as in English, but with a dot over it like the French "gn."

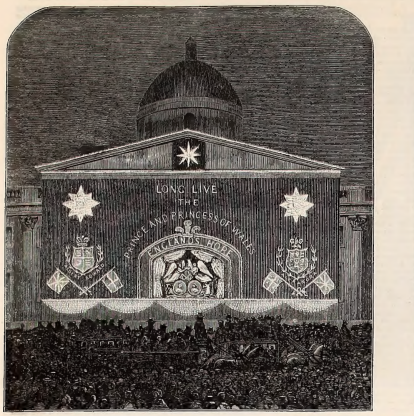
"J" also like the French "j;" the "y" being almost a dead letter: thus, Rzewski is equivalent to Jayvoski.

A new monthly periodical, entitled the Victoria Magazine, will make its appearance next month under the auspices of Miss Emily Faithfull.

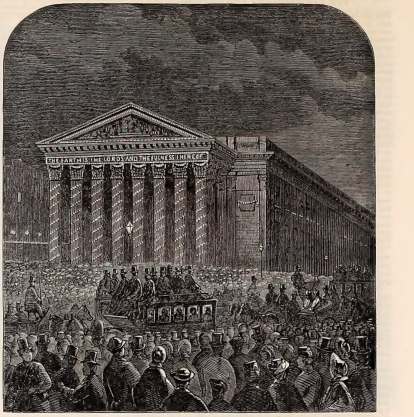
The Victoria (Texas) Advocate says that a pair of large serpents have been living on the eaves of the Rio Grande Hotel. They are to be harnessed to a large two-wheeled cart. They will carry 3500 lb. of freight, and make the trip to Indianola in a day.

WORKING MEN'S CLUB AND INSTITUTE UNION.—This society, formed in connection with the Social Science Congress last June, under the presidency of Lord Lyttelton, has had a full activity, diffusing information of service in the formation of clubs and institutes, and enlisting the sympathy of the public in favour of the movement for the general improvement of these institutions. Club, under various names, have for some time been meeting successfully at Birmingham, Manchester, Nottingham, Bradford, Bloxford, St. Leonard's, Brighton, Charlton Marshall, Leeds, and other towns, and many more have been formed in London, Liverpool, Sheffield, and numerous localities. In connection with the central union, a club has been formed at Partridge's Coffee-house, and of eight metropolitan clubs, 334 members. At Wandsworth a club has just been opened under encouraging auspices. At Sheffield—known which will shortly be visited by deputations from all parts. Lord Lyttelton, in presiding at the inaugural meeting of an institute at Bewdley, took occasion to advocate the adoption of the club and institute system in the agricultural districts. The society has also taken active interest in such matters by the publication of various pamphlets containing information of the kind required, and by the issue of the monthly journal of the union.

ILLUMINATIONS IN LONDON.



THE NATIONAL GALLERY.



THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

They were united by more than two thousand sockets, all of which were carefully screwed in at the place of illumination. Separate mains conducted the gas to the western elevation, the tower, the dome, the cupola, and cross; the latter standing 8 ft. above the ordinary cross of the church, and being inclosed in a frame of ruby-coloured glass. These mains were connected with a ten-inch main from a heavily-weighted gasometer at the Windsor-street works of the Birmingham Gas Company, which was reserved for the sole use of this illumination. The order to commence the work was given on Tuesday, the 3rd of March, and on the following Tuesday it was completed and the scaffolding, which had taken forty men three days to erect, removed.

It is estimated that the consumption of gas during the period of illumination reached very nearly three-quarters of a million of cubic feet; and, though the raw material employed was so enormous, it is probable that the entire expense of the illumination, including the gas-fittings, will not exceed six hundred pounds. From these particulars it will be seen that the illumination was upon a colossal scale, and far exceeds anything that has previously been attempted in the illumination of public edifices upon their architectural lines by gas. The illumination was seen for miles around in every direction. From the top of Barr Beacon, about eight miles distant, a singular effect was produced by means of a fog-cloud which hung over the town, and concealed the dome and tower from view—a blood-red cross appearing to shine in the heavens and rest upon Birmingham. As the traveller approached the town on this side the opacity of the fog gradually diminished until, when about three miles away, the broad lines of light which spanned the dome appeared in sight, and, magnified by the thin vapour through which they were refracted, gave the idea of some gigantic monster clawing the heavens with his fiery paws. All the avenues to the church and the surrounding streets were crowded with masses of human heads, in the midst of which stood a glittering fairy palace. The effect was heightened by coloured fires, which, under the superintendence of Mr. C. L. Hanmer, were introduced at intervals of time in burning censers, wreathing their clouds of incense among the urns upon the parapet, in the gallery of the tower, and shedding upon the windows of the church the rich tints of a peaceful southern sky at sunset. The seven gateways of iron, that lead by broad avenues to the church-doors, were wreathed in evergreens, amongst which nestled festoons of variegated lamps. So great was the sensation produced throughout the town and surrounding districts, and such the disappointment of those who had not seen it, that the committee, at a great expense, consented to re-illumine for one night more, which was done on the 13th. One of the chief features in this great illumination is the marvellous celerity with which the whole was completed; and too much praise cannot be accorded to Messrs. W. and H. N. Smith, the builders; Messrs. Russel and Sons, tube manufacturers; and the Birmingham Gas Company, for the expedition with which they discharged the orders of the committee.

Independently of the officials of the church, the Hon. and Rev. G. M. Yorke, Rector, and Messrs. Walford and Harrison (churchwardens), who acted as honorary secretary and treasurer, the gentlemen present in committee for illuminating the church were Messrs. George Whateley, Westley Richards, Colonel Mason; Drs. Bell Fletcher, and Heslop; Captains B. Chesshire, T. Dixon, and C. Ratcliff; C. W. Elkington, Clement Gibbs, Hollins, Dr. Fleming, Rev. G. Pettit, Holmes, Bellue, Hunt, Best, Councillor Phillips, James, Parker, Jeff, Keeley; and the project received the hearty support and sincere congratulations of almost every inhabitant of Birmingham to whom application was made.

EXETER.

Here there was a procession of Mayor, Corporation, tradesmen, and volunteers to the cathedral, accompanied by four bands. We give an Engraving (from a sketch by Mr. G. Townsend) of the procession passing the Guildhall, in High-street. At Bury Meadow three commemoration trees were planted, and the volunteers had a feu de joie. Several public dinners took place, and about 6000 children were provided with tea. At night a monster bonfire was lit in the cathedral-yard, and brilliant illuminations took place.

THE TORCHLIGHT CELEBRATION AT LANCASTER.

Lancaster greatly distinguished itself in the festivities that celebrated the Royal marriage. It had the usual procession, public dinners, treats to the poor and to the schools, fireworks, illumination, and monster bonfire; but the great feature of the Lancaster festivities was the revival of an old feudal celebration that had become, it was thought, obsolete. It was decided that an ox should be given to feed the poor; and so soon as the idea became known it obtained so much approval and substantial support that it was decided to roast two. As the roasting would take a good deal of time, it was obvious that it must begin on Monday. That necessity suggested another notion, and it was finally arranged that the two devoted animals should be paraded through the town in torchlight procession, which was to be strictly in character with bygone times, more familiar than the present with such doings. The programme was as follows—Torch-bearers were to lead the way, mounted on donkeys; next, a band of music; then wains filled with folk bearing flags and banners; next, two trucks each bearing one of the oxen, with butchers in attendance; next, a coach-and-four, with a figure of Henry VIII., attended by knights in armour, beefeaters, &c.; Mr. Punch, his wife Judy, and their dog Toby; representations of an enormous plum-pudding, cheese,

&c.; the procession closing with a whole host of masked characters riding on donkeys, the masks being of the most grotesque description. Along the march torchbearers were to flank the whole. All this actually came off on Monday evening, and never did Lancaster or any other town present such a scene. The streets were literally packed with enthusiastic thousands, who lustily cheered the pageant. Our Engraving represents the procession entering the market square.

LYNN.

At half-past nine in the morning a procession was formed in the market-place, comprising the Enrolled Pensioners, Coastguard, Royal Naval Volunteers, the Mayor and Corporation, with their regalia, the clergy in their academical costume, and other ministers of religion, friendly societies, and inhabitants generally, and traversed the principal streets of the town, being joined on its way by the children of all the day and Sunday schools. The streets on the route of the procession, and indeed throughout the town, were profusely decorated with flags, the bells of St. Margaret's Church at the same time ringing out merry peals.

The procession returned to the market-place, where the Mayor proclaimed the Royal marriage. This incident in the day's proceedings forms the subject of our Illustration. The rifle corps, headed by their band, formed opposite the Mayor, corporation, &c., who stood facing the south; the municipal banner, flanked by the English and Danish standards, forming an appropriate background; the sergeants-at-mace, with regalia, standing at the foot of the platform. The pensioners and coastguard formed on the east side of the square, joining the right of the rifle corps. At the first gun from the fort the town-crier bespoke silence whilst the proclamation should be made. The Mayor then announced the marriage of the Prince of Wales and Princess Alexandra, giving in full the titles of their Royal Highnesses. The announcement was cheered lustily, and the flags were waved by the school children and others. The Rev. E. F. E.

Hankinson, incumbent of St. Margaret's, then advanced to the front of the platform, attended by the other clergy, and the assemblage uncovered while Mr. Hankinson knelt and invoked a blessing on the Royal couple, using for the purpose appropriate prayers and versicles selected from the marriage and other services of the Church, to which the persons near responded. Prayers for the Queen and realm were also used, the service concluding with the Benediction. After a pause the gun was again fired and answered by a Royal salute. The volunteers fired a feu de joie, the gun was again fired, and responded to by the rifle corps in the same manner. The corps then fired a splendid volley, and lastly presented arms while the band played the National Anthem. The whole of the assemblage, led by the Mayor, gave several rounds of hearty cheers for the Prince and Princess.

A dinner was given to the poor of both sexes over a certain age at the Corn Exchange, the schools were all feasted in their respective buildings, and rustic sports in great variety were provided and greatly enjoyed. In the evening a public dinner took place in the Guildhall, under the presidency of the Mayor. The illuminations at night were on a magnificent scale.

THE MALVERN BONFIRE AND FESTIVITIES.

Two incidents, which stood out prominently in the rejoicings at Malvern—the beacon fire and the planting an oak on the Link Common—serve us for illustration. The day was ushered in by a salute of seven guns and a peal from the abbey bells; a second salute was fired between one and two o'clock, on the telegraphic despatch being received announcing that the Royal marriage had been completed. The Malvern Volunteer Rifle Corps, the Oddfellows, Foresters, and principal inhabitants mustered at ten o'clock and attended Divine service in the abbey. After the service a procession was formed in the churchyard, consisting of the volunteers, clergy, inhabitants, Oddfellows, the oak-tree (given by Lady Emily Foley), drawn by four white horses, and the Foresters' society, wearing Coventry rosettes. After parading the town the procession repaired to the site selected for planting the oak, near the "Victoria Seat," a favourite spot with her Majesty during her residence in Malvern in early life. The ceremony was performed by Lady Emily Foley. Later there was a dinner of the rifle corps at the Music Hall, and the children of the day and Sunday schools were feasted with tea and cake at their schoolrooms. The fire lighted on Tuesday night on the top of the Worcestershire Beacon, the highest point in the range of Malvern hills, was a complete success. The torchlight procession started from the abbey at seven o'clock, and, the night being favourable, it was visible for many miles. This, as seen from the vale of the Severn, was a most beautiful sight. The procession extended nearly half a mile. The top of the hill was reached soon after half-past seven, and the torchbearers assembled round the pyre, which was 60 ft. high, the area of the base being 60 ft. by 40 ft. The materials were combustible, and freely sprinkled with petroleum and tar, so that the flames spread rapidly. Gradually it increased until it ascended in a column to a great height, lighting up the clouds, which reflected the lurid glare, and being visible at an immense distance. Answering fires were lighted at several points on the Malvern range and on Bredon Hill, and other distant eminences. Before the fire was lighted up a discharge of rockets took place.

TRIUMPHAL ARCHES AT EISTH AND DEAL.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales s d Princess Alexandra, on their way from Gravesend to Windsor, at Erith Station passed under a triumphal arch, erected at the east end of the platform. The tasteful erection, of which we give an Engraving, was designed by H. Wale, Esq. The whole of the station itself, both inside and out, was decorated and festooned; and, in addition to floral embellishments, more than 100 flags were suspended in various positions, for both civil services and foreign nations, particularly the Royal Standard and arms of Denmark.

At Deal the Royal wedding day was kept with rejoicings of various kinds, which we have not room to specify. We give, however, an illustration, from a photograph, taken by Mr. B. B. Easter, of the triumphal arch erected at Deal.

REJOICINGS AT DIDO CASTLE, THE RESIDENCE OF THE EARL OF CLANCARTY.

In no part of the Queen's dominions were loyalty and affection for the Sovereign more strongly marked than in Faversetown. From the Earl of Rosse, whose castle joins the town, to the humblest inhabitant, only one feeling—of heartfelt satisfaction and pleasure for the happiness of the Royal family—prevailed.

The inhabitants of Faversetown determined to celebrate the marriage of their future King by a holiday and rejoicings on a large scale, and every person seemed delighted to be able to assist in the demonstration. Lord Rosse, with his usual liberality, supplied as much fireworks as he was permitted, and there were also numerous tar barrels and boat fires to exhibit them. It was intended to have had the display on the evening of the 10th of March, but the day having proved very wet, it was postponed until the 11th. By the admirable management of John Green, Esq., the agent, and the generosity of the crowds who flocked from the neighbouring towns and country to witness the spectacle were accommodated without inconvenience or confusion.

The towers of the principal gate entering his Lordship's demesne were surrounded by flags. At the entrance gate to the avenue leading to the castle was lit with lamps, and the band of the King's County Royal Militia Regiment attended, and added to the pleasure of the evening.

A salute of twenty-one guns proclaimed the commencement of the joyous scene, and in quick succession followed rockets, blue lights, fire-balloons, all manner of devices in fire, shells of golden rain, diamond, golden, double stars, and fountains of fire, and other pieces, with the sudden starting into light, with a dazzling splendour, of a beautiful emblematical device giving the initials "A A.," separated by the Crown of Wales feathers.

The conduct and demeanour of the vast crowds who were present exceeded all praise, all were animated with the spirit of loyalty and happy and devoted loyalty. "A right royal supper," combining all that money or best-loth hospitality could command, was laid in the castle for guests invited on the grounds by the Earl of Rosse.

BLACKROCK CASTLE, CORK, ILLUMINATED.

In Cork, at twelve o'clock, the troops in garrison, comprising infantry and artillery, were marched through the city to the New wall, where a feu de joie was fired, and enthusiastic cheers given by both troops and spectators for the health of the Queen, Prince and Princess. The joyfulls of the churches were rung at two o'clock. In Queenstown also the rejoicings were equally hearty. A royal salute was fired by the men-of-war and gun-boats in port. The yards were manned, and loud cheers were given for her Majesty and the Royal pair. The Commissioners were present at the review of the troops, and testing great taste. Of the riotous conduct of a few disaffected persons it is not our purpose now to treat. We prefer to dwell on the cordiality. The main or lighthouse tower, rising to a height of over 100ft. above the level of the river, displayed on the front a large V. R. in the centre, the centre of which was formed of white, and the edges of partic-coloured, lights. The coloured lights were disposed in two rows, the nearest to the centre consisting of red and blue lights, and proceeding into the six arms of the star. The whole design was composed of eight lanterns, fitted with appropriate reflectors. On the walls of the castle, which are very numerous, were brilliantly illuminated with wax candles, and from the battlements rockets and fine fireworks were discharged during the evening. Our Illustration is from a sketch by Mr. Robert Stopford.

THE COURTENAY FESTIVITIES.

We give two Illustrations from sketches by Mr. Paul Naftel, of the principal Courtenay Quarry, which were carried out on a liberal and extensive scale. We represents the lively aspect we saw from the High-street, the principal thoroughfare in St. Peter Port, throughout the day; the other the discharge of fireworks at night, with Castle Cornet in the background.

FESTIVITIES AT ST. PETERSBURG IN CELEBRATION OF THE WEDDING DAY OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The suspicious union which has been the cause of such enthusiastic demonstrations of joy throughout all England was worthily and brilliantly celebrated in St. Petersburg at her Majesty's Embassy and by the British residents in that city.

The festivities at the Embassy commenced with a State dinner, at which were present his Imperial Highness the Prince of Oldenburg, his Excellency Prince Gortschakoff, Minister for Foreign Affairs, several of the chief dignitaries of the Court and Empire, the British Ambassador, and the chiefs of the foreign missions at St. Petersburg. During dinner the fine band of the Chasseurs performed an admirable selection of music, as well as the national airs, appropriate to the loyal toasts proposed by Prince Gortschakoff and by her Majesty's Ambassador.

In the evening his Excellency gave a concert, at which was united the talent of all the celebrated artists now resident in St. Petersburg. This soiree, which was one of the most brilliant ever given by a foreign representative in this country, was honoured by the presence of the Emperor and Empress of Russia, and by nearly all the members of the Imperial family, and was attended by about four hundred of the élite of the society of St. Petersburg.

The members of the Imperial family present were the Emperor's sons, the hereditary Grand Duke and the Grand Duke Alexander;

The Correspondencia of Madrid says that the Queen of Spain has ordered one of the crown jewels to be made into a necklace. The diamonds and other precious stones, to the value of eight million reals (£400), will be furnished by the Crown Jeweller. The rest of the parure, bracelets, &c., will represent twelve million reals (£12,000).

We have news from the Cape of Good Hope to Feb. 20. Parliament had been summoned to meet at Cape Town on April 16, which had given offence to some of the country districts, especially as it was reported that the Session should be held at Graham's Town, and they had recommended their colleagues not to attend—but were overruled by the communication that would have much effect. The drought had entirely disappeared, and rain had fallen, though too late to serve the current harvest. The disturbances on the frontier, but the prowess of the natives to cattle-stealing was likely to lead to trouble. Sir Levingstone had returned in the Prince to Quilimane, after a trip to Johanna for supplies.

Last year upwards of four million hundredweight of provisions was imported into the United Kingdom from various countries in Europe and from the United States. This quantity is in excess of the imports in 1861 by one million and a quarter cwt. Of such increase bacon and ham contributed 430,000 cwt.; beef and pork, 197,111 cwt.; butter, 44,600 cwt.; and lard, 205,489 cwt. The only decrease shown in the accounts is 24,646 cwt. on cheese. Of eggs the total number was 263 millions, an increase on the previous year of 32 millions. When it is considered how enormously these importations have increased of late years, they cannot be deemed satisfactorily accounted for by referring to the increased consumption of population, and less to reduced powers of home production; the conclusion, therefore, seems safe that the bulk of the nation are better fed than heretofore.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

SIR JAMES OUTRAM.

Lieutenant-General Sir James Outram, G.C.B., K.S.I., whose chivalrous and brilliant career won him the designation of "The Bayard of India," was the scion of an old and honourable Derbyshire family originally settled at Alfreton. He was the son of Benjamin Outram, Esq., Barrister-at-law, and Member for Derby, by his second wife, Margaret, daughter of James Anderson, Esq., LL.B., and Anne Ord of Berwick-upon-Tweed, sister to Mrs. Anderson, wife of his brother Mr. Benjamin Outram, and George Sligo, of Seacliff House, Haddingtonshire, whose daughter was the widow of Sir William Cornwallis Harris, married, secondly, in 1859, Archibald Edward Inglis Rigg, Esq., of Carlton Hall, Yorkshire, late Captain 4th Regt. Light Dragoons, and brother-in-law to Major-General Farquharson, of the Bombay Army, was mother of Sir James Outram's wife. Sir James Outram was born at Butterley Hall, on the 29th of January, 1803, and was educated at Dr. Burney's school at Greenwich, and afterwards at Westminster. He entered the 23rd Bombay Fusiliers as a cadet in 1819, and quitted it a Lieutenant to the same regiment in 1820. He served with it in the Mahratta campaign of 1817-18, and in 1820 he joined Candeish, and organised a regular force in 1825 at Guzerat, and was appointed Political Assistant to Captain Ogilvy. In 1826 he was employed in the Mahee Caunta, Baroda, and Lucknow. In 1838 he accompanied Sir John (afterwards Lord) Keane as staff officer to Afghanistan, and took part in the capture of Ghuznee. In 1850 Outram, then a Colonel, was appointed Chief Commissioner of Scinde, and in 1857 he was appointed to command the expedition, and made a K.C.B. He was at Bushire Kooshab, Mohammerah, and other engagements; but, owing to the Persian war, there was a full stop. He borne, was debarred from taking a very active part. Scarcely had he returned from this expedition before he found himself engaged in the war in Behar Havelock the most serious duty that, perhaps, ever fell upon true and gallant men in India—the suppression of the Sepoy mutiny, which was at the height of its guilt and cruelty. After the suppression of the mutiny he was appointed Chief Commissioner of Oude; but, difficulties arising with the policy pursued towards the Talookdars, he left for Calcutta. In 1857 he was made a C.B.; in 1858 he was promoted to a Lieutenant-Generalship for "eminent services;" and was created a Baronet on the 10th of November of that year. Parliament also carried a vote of thanks to Sir James Outram on the 8th of February, 1858; and Lord Panmure did the same in the Upper House, both evincing unbounded admiration of Outram's conduct. From this Outram worked as President of the Council of India. He protested against the amalgamation of the Indian army with the Queen's, and opposed it by and valuable minute on the subject. He thus returned to England, with his health so shattered that it was impossible for him to remain in the country more than at all points, but he could only faintly enjoy them. He was presented with the freedom of the city of London and with a sword, and was entertained on the 29th of December, 1860, pursuant to a vote of the Corporation of March 7, 1858. On the 20th of November of the same year, Sir James Outram was enrolled among its first Knights. In July, 1862 he received the honour of a visit from the Prince and Princess of Wales. Sir James Outram married, Dec. 18, 1833, Margaret Clementina, second daughter of James Anderson, Esq., of Berwick-upon-Tweed, by whom he had issue. She survives him, he leaves an only child, his successor. Sir James Outram died at Paris, 11 Rue Rivoli, on the 11th inst., and was buried in the Cimetière de Boyd Outram, the second Baronet, who was born in 1838, and who entered the Bengal civil service in January, 1858, and is Assistant-Commissioner in the Western Provinces of Bengal. He married, in 1860, Jane Anne, eldest daughter of the Rev. Charles Boyd, Rector of Ashbourne, Derbyshire.

On Wednesday week the remains of the late General Sir James Outram were interred in Westminster Abbey. The funeral procession left the deceased's friends, companions in arms, and the public. The funeral procession, consisting of the Household Cavalry, marched in front of the private carriages, started from Sir James Outram's residence, Queen's-gate-gardens, Kensington, and proceeded to Westminster Abbey, the procession was headed by a mourning detachment of the 78th Highlanders, of which the deceased was Colonel. The pall-bearers were Lieutenant-General Sir Colin Campbell, G.C.B., Major-General Sir Hugh Rose, Quartermaster Charles Erskine, and the Regimental Agent, Mr. Cox. The chief mourners were Mr. Boyd Outram, the deceased's nephew, and Mr. Benjamin Outram, who was accompanied by many other relatives. The procession entered the Abbey by the great door, and the interment took place near the Duke of Argyll, the Earl of Shaftesbury, Earl Delhousie, Lord Panmure, Lord Clyde, Lord Ellenborough, Lord Strathnairn, and Lord Elphinstone walked abreast), Lord Chelmsford, Sir Charles Wood, Lord Harris, Sir James Outram, Sir Frederick Roberts, Sir Hope Grant, Colonel Farquharson, Major-Gen. H. Havelock, Colonel Lockhart, Sir H. Rawlinson, Sir John Low, General Russell, General Jacob, Sir Henry Durand, Sir Proby Cautley, Sir Henry Clerk, Sir James Elphinstone, Major W. T. Johnson, Colonel George Malcolm, Sir Henry Lawrence, Sir J. C. Kaye, Colonel Sykes, M.P.; Mr. Ross Mangles, M.P.; J. C. Crawford, M.P.; Colonel Wellesley, Dr. W. H. Russell, Colonel Stanley, Colonel Boileau, Sir Daniel Morris, Mr. Layard, Mr. Lewin, the local and clerical service, and the Rev. Lord John Thynne the Canon. The funeral service was read by the Rev. Canon Duckworth, and the Rev. Canon Jennings. His body is buried in peace, but his soul liveth for evermore." Mr. Brownrigg read the service in the burial service, and Mr. Cox the "Dead March in Saul," the choir singing the grand, deeply-affecting chorale. Around the grave when the body was lowered were many soldiers in full dress and uniform, many of officers, many of whom had long side by side with the deceased, and whose breasted faces reminded one of the hardy veterans on which, in common with him, they had defended the honour of their country. The ceremony lasted about an hour.

VISCOUNTESS GOUGH.

The Right Hon. Frances Maria Viscountess Gough was the daughter of General Edward Pakenham, and was married in 1815 to Hugh, 1st Lord Gough, the gallant and distinguished Field Marshal, Sir Hugh Gough, K.P., K.S.I., G.C.B., present Viscount Gough, who succeeds to the title. She had four daughters and two sons. Of these survive her one son, the Hon. George Stephen Gough, Lieutenant-Colonel 2nd Dragoons, C.B., Aide-de-camp to his Father; the Hon. Mrs. Haines, wife of Lieut.-Colonel Gregory Haines, Madras Army; and the Hon. Mrs. Hamilton, wife of General Sir Charles Grant, G.C.B. The Viscountess died on the 15th ult., at St. Helens, her husband's residence, Worthing, Sussex, aged 71.

SIR WILLIAM STEVENSON, K.C.B.

His Excellency Sir William Stevenson, K.C.B., Governor and Commander in Chief of the Mauritius, who died there, in his fifty-eighth year, on the 8th of February last, was the eldest son of the late Sir John Stevenson, Knight, Mrs. Stevenson, had been a Miss James of the island of Jamaica, and was educated at Eton. He entered the military service of the East India Company as an "Ensign Assistant Regiment" for 1779 as having died in Jamaica at the period when the Duke of Kent was Commander-in-Chief of the Queen's Forces in those islands of English pursuits in Jamaica after it had been taken from the Spaniards. Sir William Stevenson's mother was also descended from Henry Laurens, President of Cromwell's Jamaica Council. Sir William Stevenson commenced his barrister life was called to the Bar in English, and subsequently promoted to the office of Solicitor-General in Jamaica. He was subsequently promoted to the governorship of the Island of Dominica, and afterwards to the Governorship of Mauritius. At Mauritius Sir William's abilities and his devotion to the public interests gained for him the esteem of the people, and he was the most popular of colonial Governors. This was strongly marked by the grief exerted in the island by his death, and by the feeling displayed at his funeral.

SIR HENRY ROPER.

The Hon. Sir Henry Roper, late Chief Justice at Bombay, was the second son of William Roper, Esq., by Elizabeth, daughter of H. Fish, Esq., and was the younger brother of the Rev. Thomas Roper, of Arthuret, in the county of Cumberland, and the great-grandson of Henry, eighth Baron Teynham. He was born in 1811, and was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn in 1837. He at one time filled the office of Clerk of the Crown at Bombay. He was appointed to the Bench in 1857, and was knighted in 1858; and he was advanced to the Chief Justiceship of that Court in 1861. He married, in 1841, Jane Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the Hon. and Rev. Frederick Pleydell Bouverie, Canon of Salisbury, and grand-daughter of Jacob, second Earl of Radnor; by whom (who survives him) he leaves two sons and three daughters. Sir Henry Roper died on the 8th inst., at Bombay, near Colchester, on the 10th ult.

BERJEANT WRANGHAM.

Digby Cayley Wrangham, of the Rocks, Gloucestershire, Queen's Serjeant, with a patent of precedence, and Leader of the Parliamentary Bar, was the son of the Venerable Archdeacon Wrangham, and was born in 1818. He studied, at Oxford, a double first-class in 1838, and proceeded M.A. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Gray's Inn on June 8, 1841, and joined the Oxford Circuit. He was appointed Queen's Serjeant in 1861, and afterwards to Lord Aberdeen, at the Foreign Office. He eventually devoted himself entirely to Parliamentary practice, and in that line of forensic business attained the highest reputation and position; and his emoluments must have been very great. He was advanced to the coif, with a patent of precedence, and was created a Queen's Serjeant, on the 28th of June last. At one time M.P. for Sudbury, He married Amelia, second daughter of Walter Ramsden Fawkes, Esq., of Farnby Hall, Yorkshire, by whom (who died some years ago) he leaves (with a daughter, Emily Augusta, wife of Henry Collyer, Esq., of Dunterrie Park, Wilts) two sons—Walter Wrangham, Esq., barrister-at-law, and the Rev. D. S. Wrangham, B.A., Vicar of South Cave, Yorkshire. Mr. Serjeant Wrangham was a gentleman of high breeding and honour, and was every where respected. His death, which occurred on the 16th ult., in much lamented by a large circle of friends and admirers.

CESAR MANSUETE DESPRETZ.

This eminent philosopher, member of the Imperial Institute, and Professor of Physics at the Normal School of Science at Paris, who died on the 17th ult., was born at Lessines, in Hainault, on May 18, 1798. He came at an early age to Paris to study mathematics and physics, and distinguished himself by his vivid intelligence, retentive memory, and singular and eccentric bearing. At first, from the narrowness of his means, he devoted himself for many forty years to a profound study of the phenomena of heat, light, sound electricity, &c., and has thrown much light on the nature of these agents or subtle objects. In spite of some natural defects, he by dint of perseverance and the assiduous practice of his lectures, became one of the most numerous auditories as the most eloquent professors, and he eventually obtained the highest chair of physics in France. His leaning was towards engaging as much as possible and that his appearance in orvalis pleases almost an indication of the tour. He is said to have been also an adept in the chase—a love of which, he has left, besides very numerous scientific memoirs, a treatise on physics, which has become classical. He was also the author of "Elements de Physique," and "Elements de Meteorologie." While submitting some pure charcoal to slow distillation by means of an induced electric current he found that platinum wire became very minute black crystals, which, when mixed with a little oil, polished rubies as rapidly and efficiently as diamond dust. This discovery will produce a great effect under similar conditions. It was an approach to the manufacture of the diamond.

W. GREGSON, ESQ.

W. Gregson, Esq., late Under-Secretary of the Home Department, whose death has just occurred, was remarkable in political life as the barrister who brought that Department into the form of Government in which it is. He was born at Liverpool in 1795, and graduated at Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1815, as a First-class Man. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn on the 12th of June, 1818; and between 1820 and 1830 he was engaged in the Liverpool Election Petitions; the Whig Government afterwards employed him in the same capacity. He was private secretary to Sir R. Peel, and, subsequently, to Lord Sidmouth, when Home Secretary. He also during nine years visited and inspected the prisons of England. He was one of the framers of the Factory Acts, and of the Criminal Law Code as Highbury, and was among the earliest promoters of the ragged-school movement. In 1834 he was returned for the borough of Preston, and was a warm friend of the Liverpool Collegiate Institution, and of all charities and societies connected.

Notices of the Duke of Grafton, the Earl of Lauderdale, Viscount Templetown, and Sir Tatton Sykes, Bart., whose deaths have just occurred, will be given in next week's Number.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Right Hon. Henrietta Elizabeth, Dowager Countess Granville, late of Hereford-street, Park-lane, was proved in London, on the 18th ult., by the Hon. and Rev. Edward Frederick Leveson-Gower, M.P., the personalty resorn under £16,000. Lady Granville was the daughter of the 10th Duke of Devonshire, and married the late Earl Granville, P.C., G.C.B., Ambassador Extraordinary to the Emperor Nicholas, who died in 1846, and had issue by him two sons and two daughters. Her Ladyship died in November last, executed her will in 1857, and two codicils in 1862. She left to the legacy of £1,000 each to the Misses Cavendish. "Harriet Granville." Her Ladyship appointed her son, the present Earl, a trustee with Lord Granville of the late earl's will, and left to him the residue of her personalty. Her Ladyship bequeaths to her son, Earl Granville, the plate; and to her daughter, Lord Rivers, she leaves the residue of her property. This is subject to the payment of five annuities—namely, one of £50, two of £30, and two of £20. Her Ladyship left to her son Earl Granville the Devonshire Diamonds.

The will of Edward Loyd, Esq., late of Combe House, near Croydon, formerly of Greenhill, near Manchester, was proved in the London Court on the 14th ult., the personalty being sworn under £350,000. The executors nominated are his sons, Lewis Loyd, Edward Loyd, and William Jones Loyd. Mr. Lewis Loyd is the well-known Parliamentary Overseen, and formerly a banker at Manchester and a magistrate for the county of Lancashire. His will bears date 1857, and he left to his wife the use of Combe House for her life. He bequeaths to his wife the interest of £100,000 Three per Cents, and an annuity of £2,000 out of the income of his residuary and the principal estate. but books and pictures at her decease he leaves to his eldest son, to whom he has devised his residuary estate, subject to the above. He also leaves a legacy of £100,000 sterling, and to each of his daughters (for whom a prior provision has been made) a legacy of £50,000.

The will of George Forbes, Esq., of Bereleigh House, Petersfield, Hants, late of Bombay, and of the connexion of Forbes, Forbes, Esq., the testator's brother, and Daniel Boyd and Alexander Forbes Mackenzie, Esqrs., the testator's nephews. The personal property was sworn under £140,000. The testator held the office of Deputy Lieutenant for Middlesex and Westminster, and was a magistrate for the city and county, also for Hants and Aberdeen. Mr. Forbes was a son of the late Sir Charles Forbes, Bart., and married in 1837 Miss Mackenzie, who survives the age of eighty-two, died, in January last. He will bears date 1855, whereby he bequeaths to his wife a life interest in his estates, both real and personal, and upon her decease he devises the freeholds to his eldest son or other issue; but, should no child attain a vested interest therein, he devises his estates to come to the second son of his brother, Sir Charles, and bequeaths his personal estate amongst his three children. He also left £1,000 to the Petersfield Infirmary, bequeathing to his sister, Katharine, and his brother, Sir Charles, such a legacy of £1000, also £100 to each of his executors.

INDIA, CHINA, AND JAPAN.

The overland mail, with dates from Calcutta to the 22nd of February, and from Hong-Kong to 14th of February, has arrived.

INDIA.

The following is from the summary of the Calcutta Englishman:

Reports from the North-West provinces which have been received to the 19th instant, stating the prospects of the season to be very promising. There is every reason to expect a good average harvest, and to the extent of that average the produce would be from 16,000 to 20,000 chests. Government may be considered very fortunate in the crop coming to maturity so favourably.

Our latest intelligence from Ajmeeh is to the effect that Oakley Nongta, the principal rebel chief, has been captured and executed. A military proceeding has spread terror amongst the rebels, and will, we trust, be a salutary lesson to the Bheels, who, moreover, are not fond for his aggrandisement, has been paid to the parties who captured him. The stockades at Dhoolia remain unbroken by the rebels. The 86th Foot, which left Agra now in the Cawpoh Hills, is to be relieved in the beginning of next month. Within the last few days the Nana has been taking part in the affairs of the Bundelcund and the rebels, in which the latter were defeated.

Letters from Jeypore have been received inform us that the Nizam's Government has ordered to assist certain wealthy merchants of Shalapore in importing rice. It is said that the price of rice is so fair, compared with the high, price to be paid in the districts where the crops have failed. The Nizam has also been entreated by the Nana to interfere in favour of Dhoolia. If this intelligence be correct, the Nizam has taken a most sensible course.

CHINA.

(From the Hong-Kong Overland Mail.)

From Pekin there is no news whatever; and from the Northern ports we have ceased to receive any commercial, communicative intelligence, owing to the frost.

From Shanghai all accounts are satisfactory. The country within the famous line of defence continues to give signs of prosperity. No rebels have not been heard of during the last fortnight of more than vagrant bands of Chinese robbers, stimulated by the necessities of the city, which, of late, have rendered its existence to the Imperialists, and which have been occupied by the Imperial troops. Soochow was the case with Pootoon, a host of pirates.

We learn from Ningpo that the Rev. Mr. Parker, of Ningpo, died on the 2nd inst. from the effects of falling from his horse into a canal which crossed a bridge-road. He was much liked by the foreign and native circle of friends and acquaintances. His loss will be deeply felt by those who exist within the limits of the Ningpo river.

From Fuhchau, Amoy, and Swatow there is no news of importance.

JAPAN.

The accounts from Japan during the past fortnight have had reference principally to the internal affairs of the country; no negotiation has been effected between foreigners, representing the treaty, and the English Charge d'Affaires a short time back. The Japan Herald of Jan. 24 states that promulgations of the most extensive kind have been made among the nobility, by the Emperor's direction; that no less than a hundred and ten persons of rank have been degraded and deprived of half their property; and that, while this number includes nearly all those who have "had to do" with foreigners since the treaties were first made, the names of certain nobles known to be hostile to foreigners are not to be found among the proscribed. The object sought to be attained is clear enough. If the treaties are to be repudiated, it will be, if not necessary, at least convenient, to affirm that they were made without the Emperor's sanction; and of this the fact of no other proof could be afforded than the punishment of those who were cognizant of what was going on while the treaties were being negotiated.

INDOOR AMUSEMENTS.

CHESS.

DESPITE the oft-repeated assertion that the game of chess bears a striking analogy to the science of war, it is undoubtedly true that great Generals and distinguished warriors have for the most part been but indifferent chessplayers. Probably the popular statement is due to the circumstance that the progenitor of our modern game of chess—known in Hindostan from time immemorial—was named Chatur-anga, the four angas or members composing an army. We are informed by Sir William Jones, in his essay on the ancient Indian game, that it was played by four persons with four suits or sets of men, variously coloured, and that the moves were determined by cards with dice, thus rendering the game a mixed game of chance and skill, and, as Sir William well remarks, assimilating it to the game of whist, except that pieces were used instead of cards. It certainly is remarkable that chess, the king of games, should bear such a family likeness to whist, the king of card-games, which forms the only analogy game that, for variety and intricacy of combination, and for calling forth the mental energies, will compete with chess.

In the ancient game Chatur-anga, we recognise the piece still known as the King, protected by his army, which was commanded by a General, who stood in the place of the modern Queen. The appearance of a lady on the field of battle being outrageously opposed to all Oriental and popular propriety. These pieces are found in various forms in Europe into fierce, or fierce, then into viceroy, whence the transformation to Fers, or Fercy, and, in process of time, to the present were Phil, the elephant, now fil or fou, of the French, corresponding to the English Bishop, and not to the Castle, as many people suppose; Aspen-sear, the horseman, now the Knight; and Rukh, the English Knight; Ruch, the camel, was, according to some, originally a chariot. It answers for the French Tour, and to the English rook or castle; and Beydel, or Beydek, footmen, or infantry, are of course the prototypes of the French pions, and the English pawns.

Some antiquaries are of opinion that the game of the original game was Chatur-raj, the four Rajahs or Kings. But this as it may, the game found its way from Hindostan into Persia, where it was called Chatrang. The Arabs, who at one time possessed Persia, having neither q nor the hard ch, altered the name to Shetranj, and to Shat-ranj, the King's distress, by which it is still known in modern Persian. This was a very significant word in the sacred language of the Brahmins, Sanscrit, which changes, till full in European languages we find it still further transmogrified into the Greek, Zatrikion; the English, Archaic; the Italian, Scachi; the German, Schack; the French, Echecs; and the English, Chess. The word chess has, of course, given birth to the English check, and to the whimsical concurrence of circumstances it has supplied a name to the exchequer of Great Britain!

The works that have been written on chess would alone form a voluminous library. The oldest treatise with which we are acquainted is by a Portuguese, Damiano de Odemira, who flourished towards the end of the fifteenth century. About the same time Caxton printed "The Books of Chesse," the first book printed in England. Though these are deeply interesting as literary curiosities, we must look for purposes of study to more modern publications. The amateur cannot but wish for a better interpreter than Mr. Staunton to the excellent treatise published by Bohn, of York-street, Covent-garden. In addition to other merits, it is very clearly arranged, and, without being too abstruse, it gives all the requisite "book-play" of both regular and irregular openings, in the latter of which Mr. Staunton always understood that Mr. Staunton has achieved a very high reputation. Following the openings, we have numerous games and positions illustrating the points of play. We must not forget, however, that a knowledge of openings and positions can only impart a certain mechanical skill, and can no more make a fine chessplayer than mastering with air-baddies can make a good swimmer. On this point Rousseau, in his "Confessions," is candid and convincing. He tells us that he shut himself up for six weeks and forced over the most scientific treatises of his day, but that at the first trial he was vanquished by a mere tyro who relied solely on his genius, and knew nothing of openings and stratagems.

Fourteen with good players is the only certain and rapid method by which a learner, after he has mastered the fundamental principles of the game, can make any advance. the Emperor's brother, the Grand Duke Nicholas, and his wife, the Grand Duchess Alexandra Petrowna; the Grand Duchess Marie, accompanied by her son, the Duke of Leuchtenberg; Prince William of Baden and his beautiful bride, the eldest daughter of her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Marie; the Prince of Oldenburg and his son, Prince Alexander of Oldenburg.

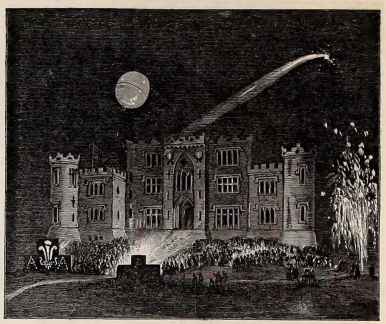
Our Engraving represents the exterior of the Embassy at the moment of the arrival of the Emperor and Empress.

The illuminations were of a brilliant and novel character. By the employment alternately of ground-glass globes and burners disposed in lozenge form, the effect of a girdle of pearls and diamonds was given to the line of gas jets extending along the façade of the building, 156 ft. in length. The cipher of the Royal pair and the Prince's plume over the entrance, which were 12 ft. in height, contained 400 burners. On each side of the entrance were two candelabræ, each bearing a circle of nine large globes. The transparencies in the centre windows of the Embassy, representing the arms of England, with those of Denmark and of the Prince of Wales on each side, 9 ft. in height, were lighted with fifty gas burners; gas jets running up the columns supporting the pediment, formed the framed of these transparencies, and displayed to advantage the architectural details of the building; while the whole was surmounted with a large rose or star.

The effect of this illumination, the first of the kind ever attempted at St. Petersburg, was all the more striking and vivid from the ground being covered with snow. It was truly an illumination "a giorno," and seems to have struck the pigeons in that light, for they whirled in bewildered flight round the house till the gas was extinguished.

To the Russian populace the novel sight afforded great enjoyment; the wide street of the Bergewskaia was crowded with majiks, and strings of carriages drove up and down in front of the Embassy until the departure of the Imperial family. Hitherto the style of illuminations in vogue at St. Petersburg has been of the most simple character, being generally confined to "lampions," or saucers of tallow placed along the pavement, or to Chinese paper lanterns. It is not, however, improbable, as gilded domes, its Exchange, Academy, and other public buildings, the mere outlines of which in gas, reflected in the Neva, would produce a perfectly magical effect, infinitely more striking than the illumination of St. Peter's at Rome.

illuminations are so frequent in this capital, that gas may soon supersede the old-fashioned and unsatisfactory method hitherto employed. Certain it is that no city in the world is better adapted to effective illumination on a grand scale than St. Petersburg, with its noble palace-lined quays, its



IRELAND: FESTIVITIES AT BIRR CASTLE, THE SEAT OF THE EARL OF ROSSE.

As the residence of the Embassy is not large enough to receive the Russian and English society together, her Majesty's Ambassador entertained the heads of the chief commercial houses at dinner on the following day, and gave a soirée for their families in the evening, on both which occasions the British residents did not fail to manifest those loyal feelings which they have ever evinced for the Queen and the Royal family, sentiments to which they had already given eloquent utterance on the previous night at a great festive meeting which was organised by a committee of our countrymen at the house of Mr. Morgan, one of the most esteemed members of the highly respectable community of merchants resident at St. Petersburg.

The Embassy was again illuminated on the occasion of the fête given to the British residents, in the same manner as that which marked the Imperial visit, and its brilliant appearance attracted as much public notice as on the previous evening.

POINT LACE PRESENTED TO THE PRINCESS OF WALES BY THE LADIES OF IRELAND.

PRESENTS TO THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

BRACELET PRESENTED BY THE LADIES OF LEEDS.

This bracelet is composed of upwards of two hundred and fifty diamonds of the first water, set in a most elegant design. In the head is a very large stone, forming the centre of a star, which is surrounded with scrolls containing four large diamonds, almost equal to the centre stone. The band consists of three rows of diamonds, graduating from the head, and has the arms of the Corporation of Leeds engraved on a small gold plate at the back. It was supplied by Messrs. Hirst, of Leeds.

GIFT FROM THE LADIES OF IRELAND.

The point-lace shawl, presented to the Princess by the ladies of Ireland, was manufactured by Messrs. Allen, of Grafton-street, Dublin, for the Exhibition of 1862, and obtained a medal and a certificate for great taste in design and execution. A committee of ladies, including the Lady Mayoress of Dublin, Lady Rachel Butler, Viscountess Gort, &c., selected the lace of which this is a specimen; and a full set is now in hand to match, and, when completed, will be a truly valuable present. The shawl and part of the lace were presented the day before the marriage, at Windsor, in presence of her Majesty, by Lady Rachel Butler.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1198.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1863. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE FINANCIAL YEAR.

EVEN in the midst of the din of party politics—when there was such a din—the voice of the Finance Minister, somewhere after the 1st of April, was always heard with that attention and respect which become a nation that does not despise so material an instrument as a balance-sheet. The close of every financial year is a period of deep import to England; and, however great and manifold may be the disturbing influences in the region of political and social ideas, a solid interest settles on the fact of the state of our revenue. This year, when parties are indistinguishable, except when they are nibbling at details, the consideration of the public finances comes as a boon to Parliamentary dulness and inaction; and, in truth, the main topics of any liveliness at all in the discussions of the present Session are based on expected fiscal eccentricities on the part of our somewhat æsthetic Chancellor of the Exchequer. There are rumours and whispers that, having nearly exhausted his grand scheme of adjustment of taxation, Mr. Gladstone proposes to gratify his intense activity and his fancies for high-art finance in experimental dealings with existing arrangements of detail, to inaugurate new systems in the management and marshalling of the national funds, and thus to preserve his character as a reconstructing and readjusting Minister of Finance. There are those who assert that it would be impossible for Mr. Gladstone to bring forward a Budget so shaped as to assume the dignity of a fiscal epic, as his manner has hitherto been, unless he showed therein some marks of originality and genius. If so, such Parliamentary and financial detectives as Sir Henry Willoughby and Mr. Henley will not be long before they pounce upon any little peculiarities which may either lurk in, or be presented boldly by, the Budget. And, when they have duly instructed and informed Mr. Disraeli and Sir Stafford Northcote, those gentlemen will accept their annual cram of facts and figures; and fierce debates, impeaching the proceedings of our adventurous Chancellor of the Exchequer, may be expected for six or seven weeks. From this point of view, a contemplation of the revenue returns for the year ending on the 31st of March is likely to be especially interesting. But we believe that the thinking people of the country will also look at those documents with the sober, almost solemn, consideration which attends to them. The quarterly and yearly returns of the national income are unerring social barometers, and in that close-packed array of figures and their results we may read the inner history of our people for the pending twelve months. A very superficial acquaintance with the influences which work upon the public receipts of the year enables any one to judge of the condition of the people at large. The items of taxation nowadays are so few in number that an index is at once given of the material prosperity or depression of every class in the country.

If we look at the returns of Customs duties we know how trade and commerce have thriven; if we scan that of the Excise we are aware what has been the condition of the industrial classes. In the period which the latest of these returns embraces, our revenue has had to undergo many ordeals. A thin harvest in addition of our trade has been cut off more decidedly before, and with this trial has come ruin to a great manufacture and enforced inaction on a large operative body. Individual fortunes, and the well-being of a special class, have fallen before a great calamity, and this, too, under circumstances which prophecy had foreshadowed as calculated to shake the normal commercial strength of England to its basis. More anxiously, more nervously, perhaps, than has been the case for many years, the public eye has been directed to the returns of taxation for the past year, and the most natural question has been, What is the state of the revenue? The answer, it may be said at once, is satisfactory.

It is not, however, to be denied that, although the general balance is on the credit side, yet the surplus revenue has fallen much less than that which was anticipated when the returns for the quarter ending in December last were made up. In the last quarter the falling off has been serious and rapid, and this fact is not without an element of warning. However true it may be, and we should be the very first to question the truth, that the soundness of those commercial principles on which all political parties have for some years agreed to act, have been proved to extremity in the past year, and not found wanting, if even in the midst of wholly abnormal causes, which might have led us to expect a great diminution in the prosperity of the country, the elasticity of its resources has never been more remarkably evinced, yet we ought not and we cannot be blind to the indications which are to be found in the diminution of revenue in the first three months of the present year; and it is necessary to look inevitable facts in the face, that we may come to make our arrangements for the year which is to come. Taking up the figures as they appear in the revenue returns, it will be found that, whereas the public income in the year ending the 31st of March, 1862, was £69,674,470, that for the year ending on the same day in 1863 was £70,005,000, showing still further into particulars, and taking the whole year's returns, it will be found that the Customs, which in 1861-2 produced £23,674,000, in 1862-3 reached £24,034,000, being an increase of some £360,000.

This is mainly attributable to the large increase of our trade with France and the general import of foreign goods, and goes far to compensate for the loss sustained by our commerce with America. Examining the excise, one cannot but remember with sorrow the cause above alluded to, which has resulted in a large falling off in that item, amounting to no less than £1,177,000; the difference between the corresponding periods of the two years being £18,332,000 in 1861-2 against £17,155,000 in 1862-3. No reduction, such as the hop duty, which was effected last year, was made from which any loss is related, can account for this diminution, which can only be attributed to a decrease in the power of the industrial classes to procure articles of consumption which come within the range of the excise, and are in a manner luxuries. There is little variation in the item of stamps and taxes, although a slight gain is observable in the former; while that which officials choose to designate as the property tax, but which, in fact, is obnoxiously known as the income tax, is nearly the same, showing, however, a slight increase of £202,000, the amount having been £10,567,000 and £10,365,000. Something of comfort and consolatory reflection is to be caught from this state of things, as it proves that as yet the great bulk of the middle class has not suffered from depression in general trade or special manufacturing industries. Without going further into detail it must suffice to say that the actual increase in the revenue for the year has reached £929,082, a creditable if not an overwhelming surplus. If it is not as great as was reckoned upon three months ago it satisfactorily averts the abhorrent vacuum in revenue which goes by the familiar name of a deficit; and we have to be thankful, not merely for an escape, but for an actual gain.

With this moderate but welcome sum in hand, and with a decrease in the Estimates for the year of something over £7,000,000, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to present himself to the country with £3,000,000 at his disposal. The question naturally arises, what will he do with it? Now, admitting to the full Mr. Gladstone's ability, even his financial ability, his honesty of purpose, and his thorough adhesion to the doctrines of free trade, to which alone we owe the existence of such a condition of our revenue as that which we are now considering, we confess that we should almost prefer that he had just to make both ends meet than that he should have so large a sum to manipulate according to his fancy and theoretical ideas. Somehow or the other, we do not anticipate a direct dealing with this surplus, such as a diminution of a penny in the pound of the income tax, which stands for a reduction of a million in that respect, and a reduction of the duty on tea to 1s., which would perhaps represent another million — leaving a surplus of the other million applicable to the exigencies and probabilities of a year which, we believe, will be the turning-point of the cycle of prosperity with which this country has of late been blessed. Again referring, and it cannot be too often referred to, to the ominous fact of the falling off in the revenue in the last quarter, we venture to assert that it would be wellnigh criminal in a Chancellor of the Exchequer to attempt to meet the eventualities of the coming year without a surplus of at least a million. If, contemporaneously with such a provident step, the burden of the income tax on the middle classes was lightened as far as regards the income tax and tea duties, a confidence would be created in the public mind which would nerve the people to meet any difficulties that may arise, and gratitude would be added to faith in the Finance Minister, who would thus be strengthened and supported by the good opinion of the nation at large. But if, as is supposed, it is intended to fritter away the savings of the revenue in fiscal experiments — if the calculations of a large surplus exist in the Exchequer — if the decrease is to be made the excuse for a sort of alchemical dealing with our finances — if hard cash is to be melted in the alembic of a philosophic Budget, in the vain hope that it will eventuate in a life-prolonging elixir which may be administered in continental doses by the Premier — if, in the exercise of great faculty of divination if we say that the present Government will be wrecked within the next two months during the watch of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What the country wants, and what it will have, in the conduct of the finance of the year is, firstly, providence for the next twelve months; and, next, as much relief from taxation as possible; so that the people may be better enabled to bear the strain and the trials that are inevitably coming upon them. A great trust for good or for evil is at this moment committed to Mr. Gladstone: let us hope that, having made all blessings and wishes go with it, all directness and simplicity, prove himself equal to the occasion.

LORD PALMERSTON IN EDINBURGH.

The festivities at Glasgow, in honour of Lord Palmerston's visit, closed on Tuesday week, and on the following day his Lordship proceeded to Edinburgh, where another hearty welcome awaited him.

At one o'clock the freedom of the city was presented to him by the Lord Provost, Wilson, and, as the Council Chamber was by no means in space to accommodate those who desired to be present, the ceremony took place in the Music-room of the Hall. In this display his Lordship reverted to the three precious years in early youth he had spent at the Edinburgh University, and was glad to find that the citizens remembered him as a "College lad." His Lordship spoke strongly of the advantages arising from municipal institutions, in the preservation of the liberties of the people, and of the necessity of all to take part in the larger affairs of the nation.

Lord Palmerston proceeded to the University, at the entrance of which large crowds were collected, who cheered him on his arrival. His Lordship was conducted to the Library-hall, where the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him. His Lordship then graciously visited the old scenes of his own experience at the Edinburgh University and, as the Council Chamber was by no means adapted to space to accommodate those who desired to be present, the ceremony took place in the Music-room of the Hall. At night Lord Palmerston was entertained at a banquet at the Edinburgh Hall, Waterloo Place, the Lord Provost presiding. Among the company present to meet his Lordship were the Duke of Argyll, the Duke of Athole, the Earl of Dalhousie, the Earl of Southesk, the Earl of Elgin, the Earl of Hyde, the Earl of Rosebery, Lord Kinnaird, Lord Elcho, the Lord Advocate, the Right Hon. Mr. Cowper, the Hon. Dudley C. F. Fortescue, M.P., the Solicitor-General for Ireland, Sir David Brewster, Mr. Baillie Johnstone and others. After the usual loyal toasts had been drunk to, which, the Right Hon. Gentleman had proposed the health of the noble Premier, and the toast was drunk with great cheering. Lord Palmerston, in responding, said that the kindness he had received in Scotland had made the deepest impression on his heart and mind. He spoke of the encouragement such honours did out to young men. He owed to the University of Edinburgh, and that he looked back to that period with the most affectionate remembrance; and the associations and friendships which were then contracted he should ever regard as the happiest source of his life. His Lordship then spoke of the assistance he had derived in public life from the counsel of men distinguished for their ability and talent. Reference was made to the satisfactory state of our Army and Navy, and the improvements which had been made. His Lordship dwelt long and eloquently upon the moral influence of Great Britain on other nations. There was hardly a single country in Europe, he said, that had not in some shape or other received a modification or other, institutions formed after the pattern, or at least upon the principles of, those existing here, and he was glad to see that some of those nations were greatly indebted for the benefits they enjoy to the intimate relations which subsisted between them and the Government of England. Warm sympathy was expressed for the Poles, and his Lordship deeply deplored the unhappy war raging in America. He could not view diplomatic intercourse, however, as all that the Government—or the nation at large, he thought—considered advisable; but, with great appreciation of the feelings which existed among large masses of our artizans consequent thereon, we had no alternative but to observe a strict neutrality between the contending parties. Several other toasts were given.

The Scotsman relates an incident of Lord Palmerston's visit to Edinburgh which does well for the warm attachment of the people of constitution. After attending Divine service on Good Friday, Lord Palmerston, Sir Percy Shiffner, and Major Anstruther left the Lord Provost and family, drove round the Queen's drive to Dunnaspin Castle, where they took their dinner-luncheon, and afterwards drove to the summit of Arthur's Seat. "They at once began to ascend the easiest slope to the summit of the hill. On reaching the crest of the Lion's Head," the noble Premier seemed less tired than either members of the party who have not yet seen half his years. His Lordship stood with great apparent delight the grand panorama visible from the summit, and, on being congratulated on his successful ascent, said the last time he was there a hundred times before. The party then descended the hill, and on being conducted to the point of fatigue on the part of Lord Palmerston was the subject of considerable remark. On the part of the Right Hon. Gentleman entering the carriage, a number of young ladies gave his Lordship a hearty cheer, which he courteously acknowledged, and remarked—"We should have seen the ladies on the hill." On the party visiting Holyrood Palace, Lord Palmerston, having been made aware that a servant who had been with Daguid Stewart well remembered his Lordship when under the Professor's roof in early days, took occasion on Friday to pay her a visit, and expressed himself as having been much pleased with renewing the acquaintance of the old domestic, Peggie Forbes. Dr. John Brown had discovered the existence of this old association, and with it a box of tools which were the property of 'Young Minister Harry' of those days. The sight of them called up the memory of days long bygone, and the Prime Minister was anxious not to leave Edinburgh without expressing his kind remembrance of her who in humble life had never forgotten him."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

It is reported that the general election to the Corps Législatif will take place in the first fortnight of June.

The Paris correspondent of the Guardian writes as follows respecting the manner in which Easter week was kept in that city:—"The Holy Week has passed over, occupied for the most part with the special claims which Christianity, of whatever denomination, makes upon the followers of each, to solemn a period. Churches and chapels, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, appeared to be filled to overflowing at the daily services, which seem now happily to be becoming more and more the universal rule amongst all creeds. The Roman Catholic churches are also filled with observers and communicants, worshipers from almost sunrise to far into the hours of darkness. Pervaded by the extreme beauty of the nights, the evening services seemed to be peculiarly appreciated by the masses of the people; and at such favourite churches as those of St. Philip, Notre Dame des Victoires, and St. Roch, the light still burned through the open doors, and the voice of one preacher or another might be heard addressing the crowded audience, up to ten, eleven, and even twelve o'clock. Our own three Episcopal chapels were equally well filled, and proved that at such seasons as the present, at least, there is no reprehensible church-room in Paris for English accommodation."

The Minister of State, in a flattering letter which he has just addressed to M. Victor Massé, the musical composer, has called on in order to enable him to devote himself entirely to his art, he grants him a pension of 10,000 f.

M. Jules Janin has addressed a letter to the French Academy announcing himself as a candidate for the seat vacated by the death of Duke Pasquier. At the election of the successors of M. Pasquier and M. Biot is to take place on the 23rd inst.

The Imperial and Central Horticultural Society will open an exhibition in Paris on the 9th of May next, to continue to the 14th, and to which all French and foreign horticulturists are invited to send their productions. The exhibition will be held in a large tent on a piece of ground become vacant in consequence of the demolitions in the Champs-Élysées.

The Council of State have decided that the number of Vice-Admirals shall be increased from three to four, and that of Rear-Admirals from twenty-four to thirty, making altogether an augmentation of nine General Officers in the French navy.

The New York journals publish the news from Mexico, from which it appears that on the 2nd ult. the French were only eleven leagues from Mexico, having repulsed the Mexicans, 10,000 strong, who kept that garrison in check.

Admiral Jurien de la Gravière has been recalled from Mexico. The Moniteur states that this step has been taken partly because the importance of the naval operations in the Mexican campaign no longer justifies the presence of so high officer of that rank, and partly because the Emperor thought the Admiral had by two years' service done quite enough in Mexico. He has now not wanting those who suggest quite other explanations of the recall.

BELGIUM.

The King is so much restored in health that on Monday he drove up and down the Brussels boulevards several times.

PORTUGAL.

Intelligence from Lisbon represents the Ministry of the Duke de Loulé as having lost the confidence of the Cortes, and that a crisis or resignation is expected.

The Cortes have passed a vote of sympathy with Poland, and the Government intend to represent to Russia the necessity of a general amnesty, and the re-establishment of the political rights, as laid down in the Treaties of Vienna, to the Poles.

An adverse judgment has been pronounced in the Courts against Mr. Lindsay in a suit with the Union Mercantile Company.

ITALY

The Pope officiated on Sunday at High Mass, and gave the benediction, "Urbi et orbi." The French and Pontifical armies were present on the occasion. The Pope's health was perfectly good, and the concourse of people immense, including a large number of foreigners. His Holiness was able to bear the fatigue of the long ceremony unless by those who are incapable of labour. A special asylum is to be erected for the poor, and will be given at Rome on Christmas-day.

Advices from Turin state that a life annuity to be granted to M. Farini, who has retired from his high functions with scarcely any income, had at first been fixed at the rate of a year; but it was being considered insufficient, it will be increased to 10,000*l.* or 12,000*l.*

AUSTRIA.

Count George Andrassy has been appointed to succeed Count Appongi as Judex Curiæ in Hungary.

The final deliberations of the Austrian Special Commissioners, appointed to draw up Constitutional regulations for the administration of the Italian possessions of Austria, took place on Wednesday. The Constitution emanating from the Special Council Commission will be immediately laid before the Emperor for approval.

The Vienna journals state that in the forthcoming quarter another reduction of the Austrian Army will take place, to the extent, on this occasion, of about 10,000 men. This will be effected by a new formation of the regiments of the Austrian Army. A recent reduction to the extent of 40,000 men, making altogether a diminution of 50,000.

DENMARK.

The King has issued a proclamation, of which we gave a summary in our town Edition last week) declaring that he has been compelled to relinquish the idea of maintaining the different portions of his dominions by a joint Constitution because his German Diet interfered in the internal affairs of the monarchy, and because the Estates of Holstein have declared their intention to say nothing to any compact. He consequently grants the duchy of Holstein an independent army, and will, if he deems it necessary, separate all the civil and judicial establishments from those of the Danish monarchy. He will cause bills for a liberal electoral law, for liberty of the press, and for religious freedom to be laid before the Holstein Estates, which he convokes the Rigsraad of Denmark and Schleswig for the 22nd inst.

It is stated, on reliable authority, that the conditions imposed by Prince Christian for the acceptance by Prince William of the crown of Greece are the abolition of the Protectorate, and that the choice of a suitable allowance should be made to the Prince. The King of Denmark will, it is said, only give his consent to the arrangement upon condition that England and France guarantee the peaceful succession to the Danish provinces. The Danish Government will, further, on no account allow the Prince to leave Kroest of Saxe Coburg Gotha during the minority of Prince William.

RUSSIA.

The resignation tendered by Prince Labanoff, the Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, has been accepted.

An Imperial decree has been published fixing the duty on raw sugar imported into Russia by land at 21 roubles, and that on sugar-candy imported by sea at 43 roubles.

The commercial railway from Kieff to Odessa has been granted by the Government to a Russian company. The railway will consist of 617 versts, with ten branches of 350 versts each. The capital will amount to 55,000,000 roubles, under a Government guarantee of 5 per cent interest.

TURKEY.

The Sultan sailed for Egypt on the 3rd inst., on a visit to the Viceroy. Before his departure he issued his decree relative to the present policy of Russia, and to forbid forced labour. News from Alexandria states that the Sultan has arrived there escorted by six war-vessels. His Majesty has taken up his residence at the Royal Palace Ibrat-Tin. Great fêtes have taken place in the town.

From Constantinople we learn that Omar Pacha, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, has provisionally assumed the direction of the Ministry of War. The army has been divided into six corps, the first of which, hitherto stationed at Constantinople, will be transferred to Schumla, under the command of Abdul Kerim Pacha. The second division of the army has received orders to occupy the line of the Balkan as far as Donau.

The Prince of Servia has expressed to the Porte a desire to re-establish friendly relations with it, and to make every concession that the interest of Servia will allow him to do.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the steamers Ripahnrg and Norwegian we have telegrams from New York to the evening of the 27th ult.

WAR NEWS.

There is nothing new from the Rappahannock, except the rumour that General Lee intends falling back upon Richmond.

From Fort Royal it is reported that a fleet of seven ironclads left that place on the 22nd ult. Their supposed destination is Charleston.

The negro expedition from Fort Royal to Florida had captured Jacksonville, in that State, after a severe fight with a body of Confederate cavalry.

The truth concerning the engagement at Port Hudson establishes itself but slowly. It is admitted on both sides that the Federal steamer Massapit was lost, and that two steamers passed the batteries. Among these is the Hartford, Admiral Farragut's flagship, and the Monongahela, which have arrived safely at Vicksburg. General Banks failed to make a land attack, and fell back upon his fortified camp. Northern accounts state that Admiral Farragut's vessels recaptured the steamer Indianola without resistance.

Hartford, north of Natchez on the 16th, and the Admiral informed the authorities that if the Federal vessels were fired upon he would bombard the city. Admiral Farragut left the following morning.

The water has been let into the canal at Lake Providence. The aperture is 20 ft. wide, and is still widening. The water is pouring in with great force, and the greater part of the town of Lake Providence was submerged.

At Vicksburg the Confederates are said to be living almost exclusively on corn meal. The river is falling, and the feaze entertained of an overflow of the Federal encampments has subsided.

Galbarge, with 1000 bushels of coal, had been floated past Vicksburg batteries for the use of Farragut's vessels.

The Memphis Bulletin asserts that three of Admiral Porter's gunboats have reached Yazoo River through Sunflower River and arrived at Greenwood. The Federals at Greenwood had one hundred the attempt to pass Fort Pemberton, at the junction of the Yallabusha and Tallahatchie Rivers, and were preparing to blow up the fort. It is suggested that Admiral Porter's arrival would stimulate them to renew the attack.

The privateer Florida coaled at Barbadoes on the 23rd ult., and her captain dined with the Governor. Admiral Wilkes subsequently returned to Barbadoes to dine with the Governor.

The steamer Aries and another vessel were at St. Thomas on the 16th inst. Admiral Wilkes intended to send his steamer there. She had left port, on the charge that they were blockade-runners. The captain of the ship alleged to the British Consul at Nassau that the protection, which was granted. The Vanderbilt then sailed out of port, and the other vessel was conveyed out by the Phaeton.

The Federal steamer Georgiana has been driven ashore on Long Island, South Carolina, in an attempt to run the blockade of Charleston. She had a large cargo of dry goods, provisions, and artillery, valued at 1,000,000 dols. She was scuttled by the captain to prevent her capture, and was afterwards shelled and destroyed by the Federals. The British steamer Nicholas has been captured while endeavouring to run the blockade at Wilmington, North Carolina. She previously made an effort to enter Charleston. The British steamer Tetterell, bound for the Mexican port of Matamoras, and captured by Federal Wilkes, has been taken from Key West to New York for adjudication.

WESTERN VIRGINIA.

The new State Constitution of Western Virginia has been ratified by the vote of the people. The Constitution provides that the children born after July next shall be free. All slaves under twenty-one years of age shall be free when they reach twenty-one years. All slaves over ten and under twenty-one shall be free at twenty-five years of age. The Legislature is permitted to emancipate slaves by State to settle there. These provisions are, in point of fact, only applicable to about 10,000 slaves.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The New Jersey Assembly, by a vote of 33 to 10, has passed an Act for the impressment and transportation of seven free negro who shall hereafter come into the State and remain ten days.

Major-General Edwin V. Sumner died at Syracuse, New York, on the 21st ult. He was one of the oldest General in the army, having been in the service over forty-three years. His last words were, "God save my country, the United States of America."

A committee for the relief of the distress of the poor in the North and West of Ireland has been formed in New York, and has collected already a sum of several thousand dollars.

Considerable movements and many strikes are taking place among the working classes of New York for higher wages. A large meeting has been held and resolutions passed to organise a league of all trades for the better protection of the rights of labour. The meeting concluded the rise of the prices of food, clothing, and rent, and declared that they had exceeded the encumbents of capital.

It is reported that Secretary Chase will put a loan on the market for some time. The Government is said to be receiving daily, from different sources, nearly 3 million dollars, which does not cover the daily expense of the war. The sale of Five-dollar Twenty-cent Bonds continues to increase; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in a foreign account, is stated to be large. Gold continues to fall. It is now at 41 premium.

CALIFORNIA.

It was believed the project to establish a British line of steamers between California and China would be abandoned.

INDIA.

The progress of the Viceroy still engrosses public interest. His Excellency entered Delhi with pomp and pageantry on the morning of the 3rd of March. Mutiny was rivalled on the 31st of February. Meerut was expecting a similar honour on the 6th of March.

The cultivation of cotton was being extensively pursued, and large quantities were coming forward to market. The total exports from the cotton districts for the season, inclusive of the balance in store of the previous year reserved by speculators in the hope of prices rising, may be calculated to amount to 9000 tons. This large exportation may be expected to keep the seaboard before the close of the season—about 6000 tons for Bombay, 2000 tons for Mirzapore and Calcutta, and 1000 for Cuttack. The present estimated cultivation of Mysore is estimated at 175,000 acres.

The indigo crop in Tirhoot were giving way, and the country was becoming peaceful.

CHINA.

The late General Ward's and the Imperial forces have effected a severe defeat in the storming of Tailein. The casualties among the united forces amounted to 500.

The expedition to Foochan has failed.

JAPAN.

The British Legation at Yeddo has been destroy ed by gunpowder by the Japanese. No fatal accident, however, ros ulted.

The country is unsettled.

Intelligence has been received from San Domingo to the 9th ult. relative to the insurrectionary movements which had taken place there. A state of siege was proclaimed, and many disquieted on the insolicted districts, when, after some fighting, tranquility was re-established.

Her Majesty's Government, judging from the papers submitted to them that the scheme of the British electric Telegraph Company (Limited) was unprofitable, has intimated that Lord Lyons will be instructed to press for the immediate release of the ship, and also for compensation, if no legal ground of capture can be alleged by the Government of Washington.

The secretary of the Toronto Mechanics' Institute writes a letter to the Hants Independent, stating that the institution has cost £10,000. It has library of 4000 volumes, and a reading-room supplied with 100 newspapers and periodicals. The members number 1000. Many of them attend classes for instruction in book-keeping, penmanship, French, music, composition, mathematics, architectural and mechanical drawing, music, French, and ornamental drawing. The secretary writes:—"Canada is a great country, and a good home for the industrious. I am sure that the starving thousands in England might make have a comfortable living."

THE INSURRECTION IN POLAND.

Accounts from Poland represent the insurrection as extending everywhere. The Times of Cracow states that it was by journals hostile to the insurrection the report was invented that the Council of the movement had ordered the insurgents to lay down their arms. No such order was issued, and the Poles are resolved on continuing the struggle against their oppressors. A prokic manifesto has been issued by the Polish chiefs, dated from their camp at Bialowiesa, March 24, appealing to Europe, and especially to England and France, for sympathy and assistance in their struggle. They ask that a contingent of 50,000 troops should be sent to England, beginning with three 100,000 rifles, and they promise with this aid to make short work of the Russians. The insurrection is rapidly spreading in Samogitia, one of the most northern districts of Russian Poland. In the combat of Uciana, five leagues from Rossieny, 300 insurgents were killed in the engagement on the 20th ult. The Prussian journals speak of an expedition of Colonel Lapinski into Courland, to which they appear to attach great importance. In the neighbourhood of Kovno the insurrection is assuming a formidable aspect. The town of Poniewicz has been taken by the insurgents. At Radom the insurgents have taken possession of the Government treasury. In the neighbourhood of Cracow new bands have appeared; likewise (to return to the north) at Sandomyl, in Augustowo, a Russian is represented as all in open insurrection, and armed bodies of insurgents are in the neighbourhood of Wilna. On Sunday a small force of well-armed Polish insurgents defeated a detachment of 500 Russians near Olkusz, towards the Galician frontier, and forced them to retreat. The belief in Poland continues to be general that a war between the insurgents and the Russian troops, and in almost all the result in a declared war between Russia and the Poles.

Anarchy is said to reign in the chief departments of Government at Warsaw. Arrests are of hourly occurrence, and the citadel is full of prisoners of all conditions. Rumours of plots have been rife that the Grand Duke Constantine is about to quit Warsaw. His health, it is said, is getting worse, and the continued anxiety and difficulties of a crisis out of which no man can see a clear way. Colonel Phipps accompanied him to that department of Poland in the train of the Grand Duke Constantine being prevented from discharging the duties.

The Russian nobility have come forward and, in an address to the Emperor, expressed their sympathy with the liberal measures of society, they will not shrink from any effort to defend the territory of the empire from foreign encroachments. The following is a answer to the report that the Emperor intended to grant to Poland separate political existence:

The Nordische Post says France, England, and Austria have come to an understanding on the Polish question, and sent separate, but identical, notes to the Court of Berlin. Harmony exists between the two on the Czar, and it is left to him to take the initiative of measures to put an end to the present state of affairs in Poland.

Some ten or twelve days ago three bales of list, prepared by the Paris ladies for the wounded Poles, were stopped and confiscated by the Prussian authorities of vers.

A vessel from England bearing volunteer recruits for Poland has been laid under an embargo by the Prussian authorities. The volunteers were enthusiastically applauded by the people. We are informed that the proceedings have been presented to the Prussian Court, complaining of the captain of the steamer belonging to the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Company, on the ground that he broke his conditions of service in carrying arms to Poland. The captain engages he carried on a certain point indicated, and left them at Copenhagen, instead of Hamburg, as directed in the agreement. Thus, therefore, the volunteers were forced to disembark at Malmö. It is stated that the Prussian Government, on the Danish Government had received intelligence by telegraph of the vessel's sailing, and had cruisers in the Baltic waiting for her, and the Courland coast well guarded.

Langiewicz left Cracow on the 3rd inst., accompanied by a civic official, to the village of Krzeszowice, about 12 miles from Cracow. On Tuesday morning at the 3rd Langiewicz was removed from Cracow to Tschowitz, near Brinn. The ex-Dictator, who was accompanied to Moravia by a commissary of police, will reside in a private house, and be at liberty to go to and fro in the town on giving his word not to quit the town. When the Cracow train stopped at Oderberg Langiewicz was received with loud acclamations by a great crowd of people, and Polish patriot went to the coffee-room to get some his fellow-travellers frequently raised the cry of "Vivat Langiewicz!" At the last station the gates were closed by order of the police-authorities, and, when the Polish patriot went to the coffee-room to get some refreshment he found himself a prisoner. It is stated that the women and children were in danger of being trodden under foot."

COUNTRY NEWS.

The Queen has approved of Mr. Robert Lowe as Consul at Perth for the King of Hanover.

The Spectator says the late for War has given his sanction to a review of volunteers taking place at Oxford on the 24th of June next.

The new Corn Exchange at Oxford, which has been erected at the cost of nearly £20,000, was opened for business on Wednesday.

Mr. Shirley Brooks has been delivering his lecture on "The House of Commons" with much success at Birmingham and at Sheffield.

Last Saturday night a passenger train on the Great Western line, whilst going at the rate of forty miles an hour, ran off the rails near Little Bytham Station, and the carriages were all more or less damaged by the shock. No lives were lost, and none, it is to be hoped, endangered; but the driver and several of the passengers were severely injured.

A public meeting was held at the Free-trade Hall, Manchester, on Monday, for the purpose of protesting against the construction in this country of ships of war intended for the Confederate States. The meeting, presided over by Alderman Harvey; and among the gentlemen who addressed the meeting were members of Parliament for the borough.

"Vote" is to be heard at some distance roaring up the river, and presently the screen drawn across the river by a local steam tug. The crowd on the towing the club, and rushing up the river with the speed of a racehorse.

THE DEFENCES OF THE COAST.—At the meeting of the Central Relief Committee, on Monday, Mr. Farnall reported a further decrease of 2298 in the number of persons receiving parish relief in the various manufacturing districts. It appears, however, from Mr. Mackrow's monthly return, that on the last week in February, 1863, as compared with the week in February, there was an increase of 11,152 in the total number relieved by the local committees in the manufacturing districts. The Chief Justice, in summing up said it was his firm—not, however, that the prosperity of the country was due to the cure and skill on the part of the defendant in making the stove; secondly, in maintaining the stoke; thirdly, in providing remedies against mischief after the stoke was destroyed; and, fourthly, in the use of the clay and wax and the bricks. He left it to the jury to say whether they gave a verdict for the defendant on the first issue, and for the plaintiff on the other three—without any further direction. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on the first issue, and for the defendant on the other three. The damages were £10,000.

Forty-four of the prisoners were brought up at the Salisbury Assizes, on Saturday, before Mr. Justice Hyde, and were convicted of the charges of riot and conspiracy. Sentences varying from one month to six months. Most of the prisoners were lads.

MEMBERS OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S COUNCIL.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL KNOLLYS.

Lieutenant-General William Thomas Knollys, Comptroller of the Household and Treasurer to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, entered the Army on the 9th of December, 1813, as Ensign and Lieutenant in the Scots Fusilier Guards, and served with that regiment from the 6th of March, 1814, to the end of the Peninsular War in that year, and was present at the blockade of Bayonne and the repulse of a sortie from that place, in which no less than ten officers of the Guards were killed or died of their wounds. He obtained the rank of Lieutenant and Captain in 1817, of Captain and Lieutenant-Colonel in 1827, of Colonel in 1841, Major-General 1854, and Lieutenant-General in 1859. On the establishment of the camp at Aldershott General Knollys was selected for the command, which he held until 1860, when he was succeeded by Sir James Scarlett, the present General in command at that establishment. Subsequently General Knollys was appointed one of the Council of Military Education, which office he resigned on accepting his present position in the household of the Prince of Wales. General Knollys has seen fifty years' service in the Army, during twenty-one of which he has been on full pay.

COLONEL THE HON. SIR CHARLES PHIPPS, K.C.B.

Sir Charles Beamont Phipps, who holds the office of Treasurer and Cofferer to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, is the youngest son of the first Earl of Mulgrave, by the daughter of the late Christopher Thompson, Governor of Virgin Islands, in the county of Durham, and is brother to the present Marquis of Normanby. He was born at Mulgrave Castle, Yorkshire, in 1801, and married, in 1835, a daughter of Archdeacon Henry Bathurst. He entered the Army, and in 1830 attained to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel in the Scots Fusilier Guards, from which corps he retired in 1847. In 1851 he attained the rank of Colonel in the Army. When the Marquis of Normanby (Lord Privy Seal) was Governor of Jamaica, in 1832, Colonel Phipps accompanied him to that dependency as private secretary, and was also Lord Steward of the Marquis's household when he was Lieutenant-Governor of Ireland from 1835 to 1839. In 1846 he was appointed Equerry to the Queen, and subsequently Groom in Waiting to the Queen Consort; subsequently he was chosen Keeper of the Queen's Privy Purse, and treasurer to the late Prince Consort; and, finally, he was selected to occupy the post of Treasurer and Cofferer of the Duchy of Cornwall.

SIR W. DUNDAR, BART., M.P.

The office of Keeper of the Privy Seal to the Prince of Wales in the Duchy of Cornwall is held by Sir William Dunbar, Bart., M.P. for Wigton Burghs. Sir William is the eldest son of James Dunbar (formerly an officer in the East India Company), and Louisa Agnes, daughter of William Ferdinand, Baron de Reede d'Oudthoorn, in the Netherlands, and grandson of the late Sir George Dunbar, fifth Baronet, of Mochrum, in the county of Wigtown, H.M. was born in 1817, and succeeded his uncle, Sir William Rowe Dunbar, as seventh Baronet in 1861. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and was called to the Scottish Bar in 1839, but never practised. He is a magistrate and Deputy-Lieutenant of the county of Wigtown, and was elected to represent the Wigtown district of Burghs in 1857. On the formation of the present Administration, in 1859, he was appointed Keeper of the Privy Seal, which office, on each occasion, being obliged to vacate his seat, he had the distinction conferred upon him of being re-elected by his constituents without requiring his presence at the election. An attempt was made to oust a Conservative member by opposing him on that occasion, being his third election, but it failed. Shortly after his appointment to the Treasury the office of Keeper of the Privy Seal of the Prince of Wales was conferred upon him. The Dunbars, which for half century held the minority of his Royal Highness; and on the 27th of January last, the Prince Consort attained his majority, appointed him Keeper of the Privy Seal and a member of the Council of his Royal Highness. Sir William, who is of his name, is lineally descended from the ancient Earls of March and Moray, and from the Dunbars, Hereditary Sheriffs of Morayshire. His immediate progenitor, Sir Patrick Dunbar, a younger son of Dunbar, Earl of March, obtained from his father by several charters the baronies of Mochrum and Cumnock, and resigned the earldom of Moray to Wytown and Ayr, anno 1375. This Sir Patrick, who was a man of great note and property in the time of James I. of Scotland, was appointed one of the hostages for that King's ransom, anno 1405, he having been a prisoner in England. After he obtained his liberty and returned to Scotland he was appointed one of the Lords of Articles, nominated by the Estates of the Nation, to the Court of England. A member of the same family, Gavin Dunbar, Archbishop of Glasgow and Lord Chancellor of Scotland in the reigns of James IV. and Mary Queen of Scots. The baronetcy was created during the reign of William and Mary, anno 1694.

SIR W. J. ALEXANDER, BART, Q.C.

The Attorney-General to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is Sir William John Alexander, Bart., Q.C., the eldest son of Sir Robert, the second Baronet, by the daughter of John Wallis Esq., and is unmarried. Sir William Alexander was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was 14th Wrangler in 1841, from where he has graduated M.A. He was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1825, and was the first Queen's Counsel called within the Oxford years he has confined himself to Parliamentary business, and occupies a leading position amongst the Parliamentary Bar. In 1844 he was appointed a Queen's Counsel, and was made Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales in 1854. He succeeded to the Baronetcy on the death of his father in 1859. The family to which Sir William Alexander belongs is of Scottish descent, and is derived from the clan M'Donald, but settled in Ireland early in the nineteenth century, where John Alexander, Esq., of Newtown Limavady, in the county of Longford, became the immediate progenitor. His third son, Sir William Alexander, Bart., M.P. for Londonderry, and whose father, the elder, was an Alderman of the city of Dublin, and Lieut.-Colonel of the Tyrone Militia, was created a Baronet in 1821, and was father of his public services in 1809. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Robert, the second Baronet, the father of the present Sir W. Alexander.

Biographical notices of the Duke of Newcastle and Lord Portman have already been given in this Journal.

A whale has been cast ashore at Dunkirk in a violent gale. It measures 100 ft. in length. Its death struggle on the sands lasted two hours.

A small, wood-built screw-steamer, believed to have been intended for the Confederate service, has been seized in the river of the Government. She was built for Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, and Co.

The Queen has appointed Richard Reade, Esq., British Vice-Consul at Bengasi, to be Her Majesty's Consul at Tripoli in Barbary. Thalpa White, Esq., British Vice-Consul at Cyprus, to be her Majesty's Vice-Consul at Rhodes.

POLISH WOMEN.—Many of the Polish women are very like our English women of the slender, delicate type, but with paler complexion, a brighter, more piercing and powerful eye, and a mouth more mobile, a set finer and more varied expression than their faces exhibited; for I saw them at a time when their countrymen were subjugated, and when all the rights of religious feelings were awakened. I had read in a note book that they were Grecian and not Roman noses, that they were constant enough to be cold, and dull persons will always mistake animation, quickness of perception, and a ready manner of turning things for frivolity. But I believe that every country women give the lose to society, and this is particularly the case in Poland, where the cold people are not to be found. Even those with a fair share of sense and sensibility are apt to be carried away by the fascinations of gaiety and the pleasures of society. But the Polish ladies are not frivolous. Their love of their country is beautiful. A gay and lap the women of Poland made a fault agreement not to dance, and they have kept their word, patient and unwearied. Their love of their country is a deeding people; and it was only because a great calamity had befallen them that they left off their amusements and surrendered themselves to mourning.—The Polish Captivity.

THE WAR IN AMERICA: ARRIVAL OF A FEDERAL STEAMER WITH FLAG OF TRUCE AT MADISONVILLE, LAKE PONTCHARTRAIN.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE WAR IN AMERICA.

ARRIVAL OF A FLAG OF TRUCE ON CONFEDERATE TERRITORY.

CUT ENGRAVING represents one of the many striking and interesting episodes of the Civil War in America—the arrival of a steamer with a flag of truce in Dixie's Land. Happily, it is of a lighter and less tragic character than the majority of the illustrations which have appeared in our columns. The scene of the incident which we have illustrated is the village of Madisonville, lying upon a little river bearing the Indian name of Chefuncte, on the northern shore of Portchartrain. This coast remains in the undisputed possession of the Confederates, while the Federals occupy the southern side. The steam-boat, one of which is a paddle-steamer kind of steamer not at all unknown, and connected in our minds with thoughts of boiler explosions and race impalement, has just landed a number of women and children, "registered enemies" of the United States, and who have been conveyed at their own request to the rebels—their husbands, friends, and relatives.

"THE CLOSE OF AN ACCOUNT OF ALTARS, FROM THE RUINS OF THE HEROUM," BY HARRY JOHNSON, EXHIBITED AT THE BRITISH INSTITUTE. —SEE NEXT PAGE.

"THE OLYMPEUM AND ACROPOLIS OF ATHENS,

FROM THE BANKS OF THE ILISSUS." BY HARRY JOHNSON.

RECENT events have startled the world into the belief of old, that Greece, like the phœnix of its ancient fables, is starting into life from the nest and ashes of its former self. There can, however, be no perfect renaissance, or rejuvenescence for the Greece of old. As we said in our review of this picture and the other contributed by Mr. Harry Johnson to the British Institution last year, the faith of the Greece of old can never be re-edified and rehabilitated. Round there the last rays of the sun of its ancient glory—long departed westward—may still linger, as the artist poetically suggests by the evening twilight effect of his picture; but, as it is, as Byron expressed it, only "the gilded pale hovering round decay!" The golden sunrise can, however, as long as the human race preserves any historical memory or tradition, never entirely fade from the shield brow of the Athenian Acropolis, even when its diadem of temples and all their noble gems of pricaline art shall be crumbled into common earth. It needs no prophet to predict that age on age may roll on, century on century, and that small remnants of the world's noblest work has inspired our artist to the production of a more than usually admirable work) will still be treasured in the recollection of orator and historian, statesman, author, and politician, artist, poet, and philosopher. Never, surely, can be forgotten the very "eyes of Greece"—of that land of the violet and goddite rose, "that sovereign of sovereigns, fount of philosophy, and shrine of beauty.

It is almost superfluous to specify the ruins included in Mr. Johnson's view, so familiar must they be. We would, however, remind the reader that the natural features and aspect of this spot have vastly changed. The Ilyssus at our feet, with its sacred fountain of Callirhoe, has become but a miserable stream. Its banks are now preasless and treeless, and, if a pestilential emanation of Ophion be personated in one of the noble reclining figures of the Elgin marbles—could now be seen, he would present but an aged, sickly, and shrunken appearance. Its water is no longer used for sacred lustration; for Albanian washerwomen now plash and babble in it, recalling anything but the scene described by Plato in his Phædrus, when he says with Socrates as they sat under the high and spreading plantane, and enjoyed the fragrance of the agnus castus, ready for the purpose of the bed. A little removed from the opposite bank of the stream still stand those rows of gigantic columns, comprising sixteen out of the 120 which originally supported the magnificent Olympeum or temple of Jupiter Olympus—the largest temple which was ever erected to his deity. Commenced by Pisistratus, it was never finished before more than six hundred years. It. A little beyond, and to the right of this, is the Gate of Hadrian, with its triumphal arch above. In the distance, and to the left centre, on the pyramidical hill of the museum, is the ruined monument of Philopappus. And to the right, towering over it, is the Acropolis, the rock city, which, as Dr. Wordsworth says, "was the fortress, the sacred inclosure, the treasury, and the museum of Athens at once." Above its massive walls, and within the sacred peribolus, still, after two thousand years, stand portions of the Parthenon, hapless no-place temple to Minerva, the Parthenon, and the Erechtheum. Hollowed out of the face of the citadel is the sacred cave of Aglaurus, the daughter of Cecrops, who sacrificed herself in behalf of her country by leaping in this place from the cliff. It communicates by a subterranean passage with the Erechtheum, by which Archephoni, or priestesses of Minerva, descended on the night of the Panathenea, bearing a basket, in which the mysterious symbols of the goddess were contained; and by it the Persians scaled the rock of the Acropolis, when they made themselves masters of the citadel and of Athens, a little before the battle of Salamis. The present Athens proper—now at the farther side of the Acropolis, and away, of course, considerably further, are Pentelicus and Hymettus.

MUSIC.

The opening and closing of our two great Italian Theatres are understood to indicate the beginning and end of the "London season." The Royal Italian Opera opened on Tuesday last; Her Majesty's Theatre opens this evening; therefore the "London season" is begun.

COVENT GARDEN opened with "Massaniello," the production of which has been regarded as the prominent circumstance in the management of the theatre; Auber's chef-d'œuvre being got up and performed in accordance with a completeness and accuracy not, even on its native ground, the boards of the Grand Opera of Paris itself, surpassed on Tuesday last betrayed no falling-off. On the contrary, we have never witnessed a more brilliant and excellent performance. It was a performance, nevertheless, of which it would be superfluous to say much, for it is understood by the musical public now. Everybody that knows anything of the musical stage is familiar with one of the most popular operas of the day, and with the great part in its cast and manner of performance may be described in a few words. Since the first of these novelties is the appearance of M. Naudin in the character of Massaniello. This part has been long since allotted to Mario, and would have been so still had his services been available. But he has retired from the operatic stand, in Spain, where he has been performing with the greatest success; and, in consequence had been made for bringing out "Massaniello" on the opening night, it was necessary to find another representative of the principal character. M. Naudin was fixed upon, and he had never performed it before, and the good judgment shown in his selection has been justified by his success. In some respects he is not to be compared to Mario, but he possesses his personal beauty nor grace, nor the Italian mellowness of his voice. Nevertheless his action exhibited much force and energy. His voice, though decidedly French, was not on that account the less fitted for French music; and, on the whole, his performance of the fisherman of Naples was satisfactory and successful. In the part next important to Massaniello—that of Pietro—Graziani was to have appeared, as before; but, like Mario, was unable, from illness, to do so, and the character was therefore assigned to M. Faure. A better choice could not have been made: for he excelled Graziani in strength and vigour as an actor, and was at least equal to him as a singer. In the grand scene in the second act, where the insurgent fishermen prepare to attack their oppressors, Naudin and Faure were equally effective; and the great duet, in particular, "Aux armes," sung by them in a manner which formed a subject for applause from every part of the house. The character of Elvira is too slight to allow room for the display of talent, either vocal or dramatic. It contains only one air—"Splendor della grandezza," which is little more than a string of florid passages. It was sung by Mdlle. Marai, with a clear, flexible voice and great facility of execution; but she must be heard in something better before it can be ascertained how far progress she has made since last year in the higher walks of her art. Signor Neri-Baraldi sang the part of Lyrenco with his usual amount of voice and refinement of style; but the character is so wretchedly poor and insipid, not to say contemptible, as a part, that no performer can make anything of it. The character of the poor rival, Fenella, was most beautifully represented by Mdlle. Salvioni, who is probably the most accomplished pantomimic actress of the day. A very look and gesture which formed a subject for study in music, and there is a pathos in her mute language which could not be heightened by all the powers of speech or song.

But the great charm of this opera will always lie much less in the acting or singing of the individual parts than in the effect of the whole. The wonderful harmony of ensemble with which each act begins and ends; the chorus of fishermen, and the lovely barcarole; the marketchorus with its many groups; the prayer breathing like a benediction before they rush on their foes; all these things act on the entranced mind with the power of magic, and make an impression which the longest lifetime could not efface. Add to all this the splendour of the spectacle, the exquisite grace and beauty of the dances, and the delicious streams of harmony which flow from the orchestra, and there is a combination of enchantments not paralleled by any other production of the lyric stage.

The King of Hanover has conferred on M. Viexxtemps the gold medal of science and merit, in recognition of the dedication by Majesty of the celebrated violinist's sonatas.

STUART'S EXPLORATIONS IN AUSTRALIA.

THE exploring enterprises in Australia, of which we have from time to time given accounts, have set at rest the notions once entertained of the existence of a vast inland sea, or an impassable desert. The entire continent, from the Southern to the Indian Ocean, has been crossed, passing through the centre. On the 21st of January last, honours were paid to the explorers in the capitals of Victoria and South Australia. In Melbourne the celebration was of the minted kind, there were funeral honours paid to the dead as well as complimentary addresses offered to the living. The demonstration at Adelaide in honour of Mr. John M'Douall Stuart was very imposing. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed in the streets, on the lodges, and various public bodies, and the colonists generally, to a large number, formed a procession half a mile long, with from 15,000 to 20,000 spectators. Various complaints were made by Mr. Stuart. Addresses were presented to him from the public bodies and others. The explorer was then placed in waggon and driven by the Governor received him at the Treasury, and complimented him on his success. Mr. Stuart, in his reply, expressed his thanks for the kindness. The remainder of his party formed a singular part of the procession, travelling with their fatigued horses, a regular bush appearance. In the evening there was a public dinner, at which Mr. Finniss presided over by his Excellency Sir Dominic Daly, Mr. Stuart being on the right hand.

The South Australian Register, commenting upon the discoveries made by Mr. Stuart and his fellow-explorers, states that their importance to the whole of the Australian colonies can hardly be over estimated. The last expedition (it says) must have the effect of immensely lessening the distance between Europe and Australia in a smaller but scarcely less important degree, the direct route which Stuart has opened across the Australian continent from this colony to the northern coast near Port Essington will be to this part of the world nearly the route through the Isthmus of Panama is to the route across the Isthmus of Panama is to California. It is true the land journey in this case will be one of considerable extent; but it will be the means of saving many days' sailing. It was regarded as well as of a roundabout character. We impress this fact upon the colonists, and, as it is of the greatest importance to them, we have not given much attention to the matter that Stuart's work was but the first of many explorations by the brave but unfortunate rival—Burke. The name of this last explorer has become familiar on account of his misfortunes. He died in opening a route to the Gulf of Carpentaria. But his memory will be preserved as one of the martyrs of the world. But the Gulf of Carpentaria is not the northern coast of Australia, and is even more than the Gulf of Mexico from the coast of America. Let this fact be borne in mind, and it will be seen that Stuart's work is not yet done. He has not struck the only other exploration; and it would have had to be accomplished for the establishment of overland trade even if the Gulf of Carpentaria had been reached by Burke and his companions. Stuart's explorations already have carried us opposite Melville Island, which place has always been regarded as the first Australian settlement to be established by the Portuguese, and has been to be extended from Java to this country."

The Northern Territory of Australia has determined to lose no time in turning the discoveries of Stuart to account. It is about to establish a line of telegraph through the new country (to be amalgamated with that of Victoria), and, further, it has already surveyed a township, and a plan for sowing cotton over extensive districts, and inviting the capital and enterprise of settlers, is under consideration. The township else which the fertility of the new country will afford them innumerable chances of doing, has also been recommended to the Executive. A pastoral expedition, to the Victoria River, and to the north coast for the north, with 40,000 sheep, 12,000 head of cattle, and a large number of horses.

Mr. Stuart's statement of the intense pleasure with which the members of the party caught sight of the Indian Ocean—certain then of their success—is interesting. He says:—"Turning, who rode in advance of me, called out, 'The sea!' which on took the bridle from my hand, and galloped forward to see it. I did not repeat the call before they knew what he meant; hearing which, they all rushed on to see the ocean. Each one seemed overjoyed; and a union jack and burying a tin case containing the particulars of his arrival on the beach, made several other demonstrations in honour of his success. He dipped his feet and washed his hands in the waters of the Indian Ocean; and brief complimentary speeches were made by Mr. Kekwick and myself. Mr. Stuart then:

We give on page 409 a Portrait of Mr. Stuart, from a photograph by Mr. R. Thomas, of Adelaide, and underneath it a small engraving is a representation of the shores of the Indian Ocean, on the northern coast of Australia, discovered by Mr. Stuart on the spot.

Mr. Stuart, in his diary, thus describes the manner in which he and his party celebrated the accomplishment of the great object of their journey:—"We had a splendid fire, and, having cut down a few tallest trees, stripped it of its lower branches, and on to the apex of the highest one I fixed the union jack, which was the centre of it. When this was completed, the party gave three cheers, and Mr. Kekwick then addressed me, congratulating me on having completed the journey which I had undertaken, and which I had carried out. Mr. Waterhouse also spoke a few words on the same subject, and concluded with three cheers for Sir Richard Graves and the Prince of Wales. At one foot south from the foot of the tree is buried, about 2 feet below the surface of the ground, an airtight tin case, in which is a paper with the following notice:—

South Australian Great Northern Exploring Expedition.

The exploring party, under the command of John M'Douall Stuart, arrived at this spot on the 25th day of July, 1862, having crossed the entire continent of Australia from the southern to the northern coast, passing through the centre. They left the city of Adelaide on the 20th day of October, 1861, and the most extreme point reached by the party is in latitude 18° 40' south. To commemorate this happy event they have raised this flag bearing his name. All hail Australia Felix!"

(Here followed the signatures of Mr. Stuart and party.)

During this homeward trip some anxiety was felt once or twice from want of water, and the party were forced to kill a horse, the meat of which he appeared doubtful as to whether he should get back alive. At the end of the journey Mr. Stuart was overtaken by the rainy season. The country is intersected by numerous springs and watercourses in which numerous springs and watercourses in which numerous rivers, with the exception of two nights, I was never without a sufficient supply of water. This will show the favourable nature of the country passed over. It was also fortunate in taking over a herd of horses at my time; and I may say that one of our party, Mr. Thring, a shepherd by trade, by his exertions and perseverance throughout this long and trying journey. To my other companions, I may particularly mention Messrs. Kekwick and Thring, who had been with me on my former expedition. During my severe illness every attention and sympathy were shown to me by every one in the party, and every effort made by record to them my sincere thanks. The names of my party are as follow:—Mr. W. Kekwick, surveyor; Mr. Waterhouse, Mr. W. Thring, assistant officer; Mr. W. P. Auld, assistant; Mr. Stephen King, Mr. John Woodforde, Mr. Thomas Hamilton, Mr. Heath Nash; Mr. John M'Gorery, shoeing-smith; Mr. J. W. Waterhouse, naturalist to the expedition."

A Bandal correspondent of the Lecant Herald reports the death of Mr. Bunyan, her Majesty's Pre-Consul at Beirouth.

The view of Sandringham Church, engraved at page 416, is from a photograph by Mr. Valentine Blanchard.

Mr. Kirkman Daniel Hodgson, M.P., has been elected Governor, and Mr. Henry Lancelot Holroyd, Deputy-Governor of the Bank of England.

An immense number of excursionists left London on Easter Monday by every available means. The Crystal Palace had its thousands of visitors, Brighton, of course, had great attractions for a large number of visitors. The river steam-boats were thronged, and the places of amusement were crowded.

THE COURT.

The Queen continues at Windsor Castle.

Her Majesty, accompanied by her Royal Highness Princess Louis of Hesse, drove out on Thursday week, attended by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey, Equerry in Waiting. His Royal Highness Prince Arthur, attended by Major Elphinstone, arrived at the castle that evening from the Ranger's Lodge, Greenwich Park.

On Friday the Queen, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Arthur, and attended by Lady Augusta Bruce, walked in the grounds. The same day their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse drove out. Their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, Prince Alfred, Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Prince Arthur, and Prince Leopold dined. Divine service in the private chapel. The Rev. H. Ellison preached the sermon.

On Saturday the Queen, accompanied by her Royal Highness Princess Louis of Hesse, drove out in a carriage and four, attended by Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge.

On Sunday the Queen, accompanied by her Royal Highness Princess Louis of Hesse, drove out in a carriage and four, attended by Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by her Royal Highness Princess Helena, drove in the grounds. This day was the anniversary of the birthday of his Royal Highness Prince Leopold.

On Wednesday the Queen, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses Prince Alfred, Princess Louise, and Prince Louis of Hesse, walked in the grounds.

His Royal Highness Prince Alfred has returned in good health. Dr. Armstrong, M.D., has accompanied his Royal Highness on horseback, attended by Lieut.-Colonel Keppel and the Countess of Morton. Her Royal Highness Princess Louis of Hesse is grounds. The gardens are being rearranged and redecorated, under the direction of Mr. Fowler, her Majesty's agent at Windsor.

On Good Friday his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, attended by the Countess of Morton, the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, Lieut.-General the Hon. Charles Grey, attended the Presbyterian Church, preceding on foot. The Rev. G. D. Moxon, the Rector, conducted Divine service. The church was crowded, and a number of persons were unable to obtain admittance, but the greatest good order prevailed. Their Royal Highnesses walked in the park in the afternoon. Captain Grey has succeeded Lieut.-Colonel Keppel as Equerry in Waiting to his Royal Highness. The Prince and Princess of Wales drove out on Saturday afternoon. On Sunday their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales partook of the holy communion at Sandringham House, which was administered by the Rev. Dr. Stanley, who preached in the forenoon. These Royal Highnesses afterwards walked in the grounds. On Tuesday the Countess of Morton left Sandringham House, and will resume her duties of attendance upon the Princess of Wales by Mrs. Stone.

The £2,000 which has been subscribed for by the county for presentation to the Prince of Wales, were presented to his Royal Highness on Tuesday, at Sandringham Hall, by a deputation from the subscribers, consisting of the Earl of Leicester (Lord Lieutenant of the county), J. S. Scott Chad, Esq. (High Sheriff), and the Mayors of Norwich and Lynn. The deputation was received at Sandringham Hall at a quarter past one, and were introduced to their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in the drawingroom. There were present besides—General Knollys, Captain Grey, Mr. Fisher, the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, and Dr. Stanley. At the conclusion of the brief ceremony the deputation were invited in a private room, the gentlemen of the deputation lunched at the hall.

We are authorised to announce that their Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will hold a Levée on behalf of the Queen at St. James's Palace, on Wednesday next, the 15th inst., and that her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales will hold a Drawing-room on the occasion of her Majesty's birthall, on Saturday, the 16th of May. There will also be a Drawing-room on the occasion of her Majesty's birthday on Saturday the 30th of June. Presentations will be made at both Drawingrooms.

In commemoration of the arrival of the Princess of Wales in the States, on the 7th of March, the channel recently buried, and now known as the Shingles, through which the Great Eastern will be thereafter called the Alexandra Channel.

At a meeting of the Senatus of Edinburgh, on Monday night, Professor Reland presiding, the Prince of Wales was elected an honorary Fellow of the University.

The exhibition of the wedding presents of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will be opened to the public on Thursday, the 16th of April, in the Italian Sculpture Court of the South Kensington Museum.

ACCOUCHEMENT OF THE PRINCESS LOUIS OF HESSE.

The Court Newsman thus announces the interesting event:—"Her Royal Highness Princess Louis of Hesse (Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland) gave birth to a Princess at a quarter before five on Sunday morning at the Neue Palais, Darmstadt, Her Royal Highness during the night. In the room with the Princess at the birth of the child were her Royal Highness the Queen, his Royal Highness Prince Louis of Hesse, Sir Charles Locock, Dr. Farre, and the nurses; and in the next room Sir C. Clark. In the adjoining apartment were Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Lord Alfred Paget, Clerk, Secretary for the Home Department; and Baron de Ricou, head of the household of his Royal Highness Prince Louis of Hesse. Intelligence of the happy event was immediately transmitted by telegraph to the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess Darmstadt, and to the various members of the Royal family."

The latest bulletin states that the Princess and her child are doing well.

The Duke and Duchess of Sutherland and the youthful Marquis of Stafford arrived at Trentham, on Monday, on a visit from Naples, after an absence of several months abroad. The Duke and Duchess came in their steam-yacht, the Sutherland.

The Duchess of Inverness entertained Prince Radili and a select party at dinner, on Thursday week, at Gloucester House, Kensington Palace.

The Duke of St. Albans and Lady Diana Beauclerk have left town for Redbourne Hall for the races. The Duchess of St. Albans and Viscount Feilding joined the party.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Tweeddale and the Ladies Hay have left town for Yester House, East Stoke Park, Wilts.

The Earl and Countess of Derby have left town to pass the Easter holidays at Tunbridge-wells. The noble Earl is regaining strength.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston are surrounded by a select party of friends at Broadlands, Hants. The noble Viscount is expected to return to town either to-day or Monday next from his country seat.

His Excellency the Prussian Minister and Countess Bernstorff left the Prussian Legation on Monday last, on a tour of visits.

Mr. Gladstone was thrown from his horse while riding in Rotten-row on Saturday evening. The right hon. gentleman was a good deal cut and bruised about the head and face, and was obliged to keep his bed on Sunday. On Monday, however, he was better, and the latest reports of his condition are favourable.

THE FARM.

The long-looked-for rain has arrived at last, and, although it has been very partial as yet, it has amazingly freshened up the pastures, which the beasts have, in many instances, never left all winter. On some of the strong lands recently ploughed a great deal more is still required to make them work kindly for the barley sowing, which can now hardly wait a day. Except where it has been sown after beans or clover-ley without being limed, wheat is generally good. In a few instances, especially after clover-ley, the slug, aided by the absence of lime and frost, has made his mark as effectually as that which field have had to be resown.

Forty-four cattle-breeders were elected at the last council meeting of the Royal Agricultural; and as Carlisle declines to enter the lists again so soon, the contest for the honour of the meeting of 1864 will be confined to Darlington, Durham, and Newcastle. The little "cream and beef county" has the strongest claims, seeing that Newcastle was the venue in 1858; but it is the duty of every agriculturist, which is, after all, the great touchstone by which rival towns are tested, that the scene most available, whether Darlington or not only on the main line, but the point from which several railways start to towns which can provide plenty of first-class hotel room.

A few sales of more importance have served as "feelers" of the short one market before Messrs. Stratford and Jones undertake their more arduous Aylesbury labours on Wednesday next. At Mr. Wood's average was £23 for forty-one, with Mr. Wetherall's Silver Bell (29 gs.) at the head, and Sir Thomas Hesketh among one of the best buyers. The Duke of Montrose's twenty-four brought £30 8s., under Mr. Howell's hammer; and Lady Egerton's thirty-four £26 10s. (52 gs.) and four others to her store. Old Flavia made 67 gs., and the six of the tribe 45gs. The Venus tribe fetched the highest prices at the late Mr. Tuttle's sale on Wednesday, Mr. Edmund Dawtrey's (65gs.) and Virtue (56gs.), were purchased by Mr. Kelk, and Venetia (50gs.) by Mr. R. Wood.

The entry of shorthorns at the Royal Dublin Show was only 167. The yearling bulls numbered 53, the two-year-olds 37, and 21 calves. In favour of the Crosbie's "Crown of Lothian," by Lamp of Lothian, who has done so much for the Athelstaneford blood in Ireland. Mr. Thos. Ball was second with "Royal Rupert," by Lord Raglan; and the Marquis of Waterford third with Anthony, by Lord Dunsley; while Colonel Pennant's Earl of Darlington, by Blantyre, was only highly H.C. His Lordship was first and second in the two-year-old class with Mr. Marshall 2nd and Knave of Hearts, beating Colonel Townsend's Royal Battlecry 11th, and Captain Bryan's Commander, only H.C. Colonel Leslie's Prince Rokeby, bred by Lady Pigot, was second in the three-year-old class to Mr. Ball's Royal Duke, for breeding, Victor Emanuel; and in the aged bull class Royal Battlecry beat the previous Dublin Show gold medallist, Mr. Ball's Lord Gazette Challenge Plate as the best of all the bulls in the yard. Royal Butterfly, who crossed the Channel for the first time, will be one of the lot, and as a stayer his career is, we believe, without parallel. Colonel Townsley was second in the yearling heifer class with Double Butterfly 2nd, and third from Alice Butterfly by Master Butterfly—and between Mr. Thomas Ball's Wood Flower and Duke of Argyll's, both by Lamp of Lothian, and Lord Walsingham's Warleby dam; but the gold medal for the best breeding heifer was adjudged to Mr. Welsford's British Queen by British Prince, to which Colonel Townsley's Royal Butterfly Duchess was second by Knight. The gold medal for the best cow went to Mr. Wraley's Manuella from Sir Thomas Hesketh, and both Mr. Ball's entries, with very few pens of sheep were shown, and one great flockmaster has lost about 5000 from the rot.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE sporting world has kept its Easter week most royally by attending at no less than three-and-twenty meetings. Lord Stamford opened the list of amateur steeplechasing the Cotswolds, and the old hood-looking Romsey, but his Livingstone could not reverse the Northampton running with Pandemonium, and was beaten by Mr. Batting at 1000 to 15. The attendance and the sport were very poor, and the weather, as it was most unlucky in keeping, in the absence of first favourites had a hot time of it on Tuesday, as Dunkold, Bright Cloud, Cassilda, Ocsander, and, lastly, the much-trumpeted Physalis each, for different reasons of whom the sporting world knows all, left Mr. Payne the guarantee—one and all deceived them. Sam Rogers won his first race on Lord Standish at the end of the Tuesday's sport, albeit Wells did ride her in West Australian's Derby saddle, finishing a bad third. The Hunter and another of those Bright Cloud colts which make up the racing glory of Mentmore, were, however, too much for his Lordship's Cassilda, on whom 4 to 1 was freely laid in the next race, the quality of the Burnand doings (only two of which were in the Derby, and all save Escape in the St. Leger may be judged of with the fact of Shirmaker's having won the Derby and winning a neck from Gladstone, who ran a bad third to King of the Vale on Monday of the four first losing within a length, Knight, in the Newmarket Handicap Fairwater (9st. 31b.) made a rare bid, but 3lb. to the winner, Bedouin, and 35lb. to Watchman for her year, shut up the tremendous ball at the finish, Wells, as she had she lost second honours by a head. Attaman, her second at Northampton, scratched here from Physalis colt, by Lord Clifden's sixth, with Man-at-Arms, Pate, Carisbrook, Brown Duchess, "The Cape," and seven others in "the spread eagle."

Wednesday's second name very cheering, and Sam Rogers was elected to be hard on Oscar to get him home a winner over the R. M. Lord Zetland's Bedouin like stripes" were soon in front of Lord and Amelia, who did not give Canace and Cassilda a ghost of a chance. Argument Adonikhoff every one got beaten, and he could not be over the T. Y. C.; and Brodella defeated Bucklestone so easily at their Grace's Stakes that the name sprung from 5 to 1 on her at last Durham, Theobalds, a half-sister to Daniel O'Rourke, won her race cleverly on the first day, and was beaten by a Will Huntsman filly by a neck on the second; and at Cattenick King of the Vale was in force for the Triennial, with Zapateado and two more behind him. Thirsk closed the Tuesday and Wednesday's sport, Mr. Hodgson's for the two following days; and eight other steeplechase meetings help out the week.

The excessively dry weather has rather prematurely closed the season for some of the leading packs, but now that there has been come much holidaying indeed to keep at it for a month yet, as the Brigstock country. Among the packs in the Midlands none have had more consistently good sport than Mr. Gretton's. The Lake of Rutland's, we believe, finished on Thursday week; and, with the exception of the East of Wilton, Lord Newport, and Mr. W. Craven, all the Southern have departed. Their steeplechases were such a success that it is whispered that the gentleman's race may resolve itself into at least one of five each, with £100 added. The Monday came when Smoke and four of the fourteen led over the second brook almost alone, and was one of the prettiest sights of the season when the London batting men who stayed for a "cessation" after Croxton Park.

The Melton season has been brilliant in point of company, but below the regular sport. The scent was bad on the Monday, and the heavy rain did not improve it as was expected, and then came the long drought. Lord Stafford's hounds became the property of Mr. Clowes on Saturday last. They consist of 15 couple of young hounds and 20 couple of old. The old and young draughts of 30 couple go, we believe, to Hungary, and Mr. Clowes is to get part of the young draught from Wynnstay. Tredwell, whose average of 1 fox during last season with Lord Stamford has been 42½ brace, is not yet re-engaged. The hunting stud for sale consists of about 70 and 80, of which about 30 are very high class. We hear that his Lordship reserves nothing but his favourite grey horse Brunswick and the old hound Albert, as a proof of his personal mastership; and a portrait of him on the one, with the other at his side, would form the best testimonial which the county could offer him in acknowledgment of it.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

An attempt was made on Sunday to hold a meeting in Hyde Park to express sympathy with Poland. The police, however, interfered and prevented a crowd from assembling.

A little girl, at Stepney, seven years old, was accidentally killed last week by a blow on the head from a broom-stick, which some idle lads were playing with in the street in front of her.

An Italian confectioner, aged forty-eight, has died from excessive smoking, which produced a malignant ulcer "had unquestionably produced disease or nervous paralysis of the heart."

The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress gave the usual banquet at the Mansion House on Wednesday evening. There were nearly 300 in all, and the Egyptian Hall presented a brilliant spectacle.

The annual meeting of the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester, took place on Wednesday evening, when 400 microscopes were exhibited by the members, with many new and interesting objects.

The Emperor of the Russians has this morning, as the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts took place, on Wednesday, at the galleries of Suffolk-street, which on the 1st of May will be opened to the public, were decorated with the pictures forming the exhibition of the present season.

The Prince of Wales left Dublin on Tuesday on his return trip of their season on Thursday week, and on the following day proceeded on a visit to Lord Lansdowne, at Bowood, in Wiltshire. On Saturday his Royal Highness, Mr. R. Hewitt, hoisted his flag on board his custom-yacht Galatea, and left Cowes for Portsmouth. There, on board, they proceeded to Erith, where the members of the Club and their friends dined at the Pier Hotel, Gravesend.

The City Police Committee have presented their report in reference to the appointment of a Chief Commissioner of Police in the room of the late Sir Richard Mayne. They state that the duties appertaining to the duties he shall be required to perform—these being of a more extensive character than those which have hitherto devolved upon the Chief Commissioner. The salary they suggest is £1000 per annum, with a residence in the Old Jewry, a commodious house recently built in the field for the purpose.

The eighteenth anniversary dinner of the Royal General Theatrical Fund was held on Wednesday, at Willis's Rooms, under the chairmanship of Mr. Charles Dickens presided over about 200 guests. The Queen sent her annual donation of £50, and the various contributions to-day's list amounted. The society has eighteen annuitants, receiving from £40 to £70 per annum. It also benefits the widows of deceased members. Since 1853 it was paid to these annuitants. The society's invested capital is about £13,000.

Last week the births of 1972 children—955 boys and 1017 girls—were registered in London. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1853-62 the average number (corrected) was 1926.——In the week that ended last Saturday the deaths registered in London were 1,135, being an increase by 119 than they were in the previous week. The average number of deaths in the corresponding week of ten years 1853-62 is, with a correction for increase of population, 1068.

Mr. Sala and Mr. Arundell have promised their services to a concert on the 16 proxima, in aid of the Royal Hospital for Incurables at Putney. Mr. Sala will read his lecture on the Art of Journalism, delivered at the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, to be held at the Freemasons' Tavern, on the 22nd inst., and Mr. Arundell will sing the Bold Buccaneer, which he repeats at the annual meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, which is to be held on the 4th of May, in Exeter Hall.

THE RECEPTION AT CAIRO OF THE SULTAN'S ENVOY TO THE NEW PACHA OF EGYPT.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE SULTAN'S FIRMAN AT THE CITADEL, CAIRO.

We have already illustrated the reception at Cairo of the Consular Corps by the Viceroy of Egypt on his accession to the Throne. Another ceremony has since taken place—one of some importance, and so thoroughly Oriental in character that it cannot fail to be interesting to our readers. The Sultan's firman is, in fact, the official recognition and acceptance of Prince Ismail Pacha as Viceroy of Egypt. Although the hereditary succession of the members of the family of the great Mohamed Ali has been secured by treaties, still the old custom has been adhered to, and the new Viceroy is officially recognised by imperial mandate.

Immediately after the accession of the present Viceroy, an Envoy was sent to Constantinople to announce officially the death of the late Viceroy, Said Pacha, and the succession of Ismail Pacha. Upon receiving the intelligence, his Majesty the Sultan at once dispatched an officer of high rank, Wassein Pacha, with the firman recognising the circumstances in the customary complimentary manner; and inviting the Viceroy to pay his homage at Constantinople, in accordance with old-established usage. The Imperial functionary was received with military honours, and on his arrival at Cairo was lodged in one of the numerous palaces.

Thursday, the 12th ult., was appointed for the public reception of the firman at the citadel. Accordingly, on that day the population of Cairo turned out at an early hour, and the streets leading to the fortress were thronged long before the procession made its appearance. At about 9 a.m. the troops began to move. A strong body of mounted and foot police preceded the soldiery to clear the way, no light task in the narrow streets of Cairo. Close upon the heels of the executive came two fine regiments of Arab infantry, in heavy marching order, followed by some squadrons from different cavalry regiments, the most conspicuous amongst whom were the Cuirassiers of the Guard, clad in chain mail, and mounted on fiery little Arab horses scarcely up to the height of the men and armour they had to carry. The Black Dragoons also attracted much notice, their glittering brass helmets and cuirasses giving them a very martial look.

The troops were followed by a large number of grandees, splendidly attired and mounted upon richly-caparisoned chargers, after whom came Wassein Pacha, the special Envoy, bearing in his hand the Imperial letter. His Excellency was accompanied by a brilliant Staff and several Pachas blazing in gold lace and decorations. A strong guard of Lancers closed the procession. Our Engraving represents the latter part of the procession entering the grand court of the citadel. The regiments composing the guard of honour are seen forming up in the foreground.

The magnificent mosque of Mohamed Ali, in the background, completes a very interesting and effective scene. The Palace cannot be seen from this point of view, lying more to the left. At its entrance the Viceroy, attended by a large assemblage of dignitaries, received the Envoy, and led the way to the Throne-room, where he took up a position on the dais in front of the throne, having on his right Prince Halim Pacha, and on his left Wasseim Pacha. Down each side of the room were ranged the principal ecclesiastics (Ulemahs) and public functionaries, the clergy taking precedence. The firman then being presented to the Viceroy with the customary formalities, it was handed to one of the Secretaries of State, who read it in a loud voice. The Viceroy made a brief speech in reply. The Ulemahs, or priests, offered up a prayer, the cannon from the fortress saluted, and the ceremony was brought to a conclusion. The whole city was brilliantly illuminated in the evening.

ANNUAL GATHERING OF THE COMUNN NA FEINNE, OR FINGALIAN SOCIETY, AT GEELONG, AUSTRALIA.

THE Comunn na Feinne, whose annual gathering at Geelong we have engraved, is a Highland Society of Australia, instituted in 1856, for the cultivation of the Gaelic language and Highland nationality, philanthropy, archæology, &c. Although so recently established, it boasts a numerous offspring of similar societies in the colony. A very prominent feature of the association is the encouragement of education, for which purpose it holds regular examinations, and offers prizes and medals. Its president is his Excellency Sir Henry Barkly, K.C.B., Governor-in-Chief of Victoria, and, by way of encouraging its members in such manly exercises as should fit them, if not "to seek the strife of shields," at least not to shun it when forced upon them, the society holds each January an annual gathering, at which athletic sports and Highland games are practised.

Our Engraving, for which we are indebted to Robert Sharrs, Esq., of Geelong, the vice-president of the society, represents the last meeting held on New-Year's Day, summer time there, it will be remembered. We extract the following interesting description from the Melbourne Argus:—"The morning certainly threatened so badly that it was expected very few would attend; but as the day wore on, and the wind lost some of its rigour, large numbers of people—and among them many ladies—wended their way to the grounds of the society, at South Geelong. The attendance generally was quite equal to that of the last two years, and the 'Comunn' was well patronised, the extensive ground being remarkably well filled—in fact, all but crammed. The display of 'kilt and philibeg' was perhaps quite as good as we have seen it; but the competitors, except for the foot-races, was not equal to that of former years; and, either from the want of 'Glasgow magistrates,' the absence of a hot wind, or some other thirst-provoking cause, the booths were but poorly patronised. The grounds of the society were, as usual, decorated with flags and evergreens, while above all floated from a tall flagstaff the ancient standard of what was once the kingdom of Scotland. The splendid band of the Artillery Brigade was in attendance during the day, and played a number of favourite and fashionable selections of music; while to those who preferred the sound of 'little pigs' squeaking,' there was a tolerable muster of those killed musicians who draw dulcet strains from a 'blether under their oxter.' The committee met at the Mechanics' Institute at ten o'clock, and proceeded in procession to the grounds, headed by the Artillery band and a company of pipers, who relieved each other alternately. The procession was brought up in the rear by a company of aboriginals, among whom was one lady only, and to whom the committee, with becoming gallantry, had presented a brown print dress, a white bonnet with red flowers, and an ample crinoline, of which she seemed to be remarkably proud, although, from the high wind prevailing and the awkwardness of a new style, she did not manage to wear her trappings so modestly as some of her fairer sisters; and the occasional peeping out of a dirty, black, and by no means handsome foot and ankle, corresponded badly with the extensive headdress and ample skirt of this black fair one. The games generally seemed to give much satisfaction, although the entries in many cases were light, and the 'gathering' was patronised by a large number of the elite of our society. Perhaps the most interesting feature of the whole day's proceedings was the distribution of the educational prizes to those children of the various schools who had been successful competitors at the late examination under the auspices of the Comunn na Feinne. These were distributed by the Mayor of Geelong, and an appropriate address was delivered to the young folks by the Rev. Mr. Henderson. Taken altogether, the proceedings in connection with the Comunn na Feinne Society may be pronounced a success far beyond what the weather and other causes justified us to expect."

THE LATE SIR TATTON SYKES, BART.

We once heard a Yorkshireman asked what were the three things most worth seeing in his county? His reply was "York Minster, Fountain's Abbey, and Sir Tatton:" and then, feeling that he had given too much prominence to ecclesiastical architecture, he added that he should like to take out the Abbey and name Voltigeur. Among all the men of mark to which Yorkshire has given birth he could have selected none that were more completely the county type than the old Baronet of Sledmere. His hospitality, his high-bred courtesy, his devotion to sporting and agriculture, and, above all, his steady belief that there was "no place like home," had long passed into a proverb; and hence it was no wonder that both foreigners and wilderness bleed to "stand well with him." The premier county, with its own peculiar associations, could alone have moulded his character. No Parliamentary ambition or Belgravian pleasures could lure him from it for more than a few days at a time, and at long intervals. The Campagna and the Champ de Mars had no attractions for him in comparison with Knavesmire and Doncaster Moor; and in his heart of hearts "The Stately Pair," sung in character, ranked before Mozart or Rossini. In his dress he was faithful to "the old style"—top-boots, drab breeches, black single-breasted frock-coat, and frill; and his quaint ways and sayings were handed down as cherished traditions. When it was called forth, his Quakerlike terseness of retort was such that even Jerrold might have envied; and the most homely illustrations fell from his lips with a point which no other tongue seemed to give them. When a politician, whose opinions had been rather erratic, thought fit to rally him on still retaining his antiquated cost, he replied, "Yes, my Lord; but you've changed your coat so often I didn't know you." And when he playfully congratulated the bride of a very long courtship, he told her that she "must not be like John Brown's mare, which took a deal of catching and was not worth much when she was caught."

THE LATE SIR TATTON SYKES, BART.

He was the son of Sir Christopher Sykes, the second Baronet, by the daughter of William Tatton, Esq., of Withenshaw, Cheshire, and grandson of the Rev. Mark Sykes, D.D. His youthful days were spent at Bishopthorpe, Westminster, and at Brasenose College, Oxford; and, after a short legal education in London, he went back north, to take part in a banking business at Hull, to which town his family originally belonged. Here his future sheep tastes soon developed themselves, and the Bakewell sheep which he purchased at Holmpierrepont formed the nucleus of the flock whose blood he preserved so pure, although rather at the expense of size, for nearly seventy years. Under the fostering care of the East Riding his horse tastes soon began to crop up. At twenty-one he owned a racer, and two years after he won the first race for himself, on Hudibras, at Malton. He was nearly sixty when he last wore silk, and his enthusiastic love of a mount, his long easy seat, and fine hands and patience, are still remembered by veterans from Bibury to Aberdeen. He understood hounds quite as well as horses, and was as particular about their legs and feet. Mr. Conyers used to get the young draught every year, and declared that no amount of field or road work tired them. For nearly forty years he was an M. F. H., the first part of the time in conjunction with his brother, Sir Mark, who died in 1823; and the Carter family transmitted the horn from father to son as the Leadhams have done at Mr. Meynell Ingram's, and the Smiths were wont to do at Brocklesby.

Although not equal in size to some on the Continent, his stud was far in advance, as far as numbers went, of any in the United Kingdom; and when the Ducking was over there were, latterly, not far short of 400 thoroughbreds in the Sledmere paddocks or placed out to graze. All the best blood of the day has been represented there, from Whalebone downwards; and his Camillas, Comus, and Cervantes, and latterly his Sleight of Hand and Hampton mares formed the great strength of the stud. With the exception of a few of the culls, which went to York December Fair, he did not sell fillies, but kept them to fill up gaps in his brood-mare regiment, which grew larger and larger every year; and thus mares, perhaps fit to win an Oaks or St. Leger, never looked through a bridle, while the chance of reputation for his sires was seriously diminished. However, it was his fancy, and among his colts there was a very fair number of winners. For Grey Momus, and his very inferior brother, Grey Milton, as yearling and foal he received 1060 guineas from Lord George Bentinck; and in 1861 five of his yearlings averaged 386 guineas. None of his sires paid him better than Rifleman and Daniel O'Rourke, the former especially; and his bold 3000-guinea stroke for Fandango was his last public bargain. He never bred a winner of any of the three great races; but his blood was third for the Derby with Grey Momus in Pleasbourne's, and second with Black Tommy in Blink Bonny's year.

The yearlings which were not sold during the York August meeting, where they were first sent in 1855, were often kept on till four years old, and then Mr. James Hall or some other of the largest hunter buyers took them.

His fondness for horses did not monopolise his attention; good hedges, ponds, and farm-buildings were a great point with him; and no one did more towards reclaiming the wolds, which his father had found in almost primitive bleakness, and in encouraging his tenants to farm well. The schools also, and the churches which he reared all over his property, and the works of charity which, in conjunction with her ladyship, who died in 1861, he did so silently and so well, have made for both an enduring memorial.

Beyond the loss of one eye and the failing sight of the other, he had known no illness or decay, so to speak, till within the last six or seven months. Some of his friends then saw symptoms at Doncaster which made them feel that his seventy-eighth year there would never be paid, and an attack of bronchitis, in November, gave him a severe shake. He died at Sledmere, after a short illness, on March 21, at the age of ninety years and seven months, and is succeeded by his eldest son, the present Sir Tatton Sykes.

Our Portrait of Sir Tatton Sykes is from a photograph by the new process of Mr. Eastham, of Manchester.

MALTA, THE SICK QUARTERS OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALFRED.

THE Royal Naval Hospital at Malta, which we have this week engraved, was built in 1720 as a residence for the Prior of Bighi, an Italian, from whom the point of land on which it is situated and the adjoining bay take their names, and a member of the last order of chivalry, the Knights of Malta. The building was occupied for a short time by Napoleon Bonaparte during his stay at Malta; and some of the old Maltese living in the neighbourhood still point out the room in which the "Great Captain" slept.

Subsequently it fell into partial ruin, until it was purchased, with the adjacent grounds, by the English Government, when it was restored, two wings added, and the whole completed and fitted up as a naval hospital in 1833, under the supervision of the present Director-General of the Navy Medical Department, Sir John Liddell. During the last three years, under the administration of the present Deputy Inspector-General, Dr. Armstrong, it has been much improved.

The original or centre building contains the chapel, the quarters for the medical storekeeper, and the Deputy Inspector-General having quarters on the margin of Benaia Creek.

The wings afford accommodation for the sick men and officers of the fleet, and are exemplary for their thorough ventilation, comfort, and cleanliness. The hospital received the laudatory approval of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who recently honoured the establishment with a visit; of Dr. Sutherland, the chief sanitary authority of the army, and many others.

The hospital stands on the left of the grand harbour on entering, on a high point of land, and presents an imposing appearance. Its gardens, the boundaries of which are washed by the clear blue Mediterranean, are bright with sunshine and flowers, and materially assist in promoting the complete recovery of the convalescents.

As an hospital it possesses many advantages, both of site and construction. It has spacious and pleasant corridors, which shield the patients from the too great heat of the summer midday sun and from the wet and inclemency of winter. The wards are about 30 ft. in height, and to each patient is allowed 1800 cubic feet of air.

The room occupied by his Royal Highness was in the left or west wing of the hospital. Its windows commanded an extensive and cheerful view of the grand harbour Valetta, on the opposite side, and of the busy scene between.

THE ROYAL NAVAL HOSPITAL, MALTA, THE SICK QUARTERS OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALFRED.

THE VOLUNTEER FIELD-DAY AT BRIGHTON.

THE town of Brighton is becoming so much accustomed to an Easter Monday review that, although it does every honour to the occasion and extends a cordial welcome to the fine volunteer army which on that day assembles in its neighbourhood, it does so with a coolness and composure which contrasts strangely with its excitement of two years ago. There is nothing extraordinary in this. We are such creatures of habit that a condition of war itself becomes after a while not only tolerable but a positively pleasurable excitement, the absence of which is regretted. It will be remembered that, after the south side of Sebastopol was taken, we, like many accustomed to the sound of bullets in their close neighbourhood and the whir of larger projectiles disturbing the air about them, would not only take to our rest as usual, but were positively known to go out of their way for the enjoyment of running the gauntlet of spots swept by the Russian fire.

It will be seen, however, that a sight like that which was presented on the downs at Brighton on Monday last should have become so familiar as to attract but little comment. It is a good sign for the safety of the country when it has become possible to transport 16,000 men to a spot fifty miles from where they quit the metropolis, and for men to a spot fifty miles from where they quit the metropolis, and for them to begin to handle the phases of a mimic battle, and to bring them back to their homes the same day in time for a late supper. If ever the time shall come—may it be long first—when a foe shall land, reports shall be known to threaten our shores, the recollection that it is possible to turn pale into earnest, and that, owing to the almost perfect network of coast railways, our reserves may as well be at London or Chatham as within a few miles of the actual spot where the enemy may be attempted, will be found a source of confidence and reassuring one. It will be a still more gratifying reflection then, perhaps, than it is now, that we are no longer dependent for safety upon the mere pluck which must always be limited in numbers, but that we possess in the volunteer force history shows us the becoming disciplined men who are spirited; and who, while they are content to reduce themselves to the traditional military standard of machines, retain the somewhat valuable quality of being intelligent ones.

Among the volunteers themselves a still greater disposition than usual was evinced to take advantage of their Easter holiday to acquire an insight not only into the pomp and circumstance of glorious war, but into more of its more prosaic incidents. For long previously parties of the volunteers marched from London to the scene of action in full fighting order; while others, mistrusting their pedestrian powers, left town by train on the Saturday morning, and took up their quarters in Brighton, forming themselves during their stay into regimental messes. A considerable number, perhaps, of this, but every one of the railway facilities offered by the action of the south coast railways Londonwards, left no excuse to the youngest of the volunteer clerks for the scene of action. The first corps to arrive at Brighton was [the celebrated Inns of Court, who had paraded in the Temple Hall, Brighton, and found themselves lodged at the excellent breakfast at the King and Queen Hotel before the majority of Londoners had yet left their beds. Then the various corps by trains came in fast and full, discharging their living cargoes under the superintendence of Colonel Maude and Colonel Lennard, and quickly and expeditiously, so that by ten o'clock the whole infantry force, numbering about 16,000 men, were at their places of rendezvous ready, when the signal should be given, for all the world as they were to the scene of action. About half-past eleven the various battalions began to move through the streets, preceded with spotless bands of music. It was arranged that the marching past and saluting the General in command should be in this case precede the fight, as the cavalry and horse battery of the Hon. Artillery Company being already formed near at hand led the way so soon as the first infantry column appeared in view. The General Lord Harry Vane Peault, K.C.B., commanded, was attended by the Earl of Chichester (Lord Lieutenant of the County), the Earl of Cardigan, the Mayor and Corporation of Brighton, C.B. the following officers composed his general Staff:—Colonel M'Murdo, C.B., Inspector-General of Volunteers; Colonel Lennard, C.B.; Lieutenant-Colonel R. G. A. Luard, Lieutenant-Colonel C. F. Dobeton, Lieutenant-Colonel G. Hume, and Lieutenant-Colonel G. B. Hamilton, Assistant Inspectors of Volunteers.

The following will be found to be a list of the volunteer corps upon the field, although not given in the order in which the various parts took place:—

The whole infantry force—which, so far as it was possible to ascertain, numbered about 16,000 men—was divided into two divisions. The first division was commanded by Major-General Russell, and was constituted as the following manner:—

First Brigade.—Lieutenant-Colonel Thrond, commanding: Captain Baldwin, 21st Brigade; Duke of Brigade; 1st Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Alfred M'Leod—1st Middlesex Engineers; 1st Tower Hamlets; 1st City of London, 2nd Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. C. N. Hanbury—2nd Middlesex; 3rd Battalion, Major H. B. Parnall—1st Administrative Battalion, Kent. 4th Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel G. Wardle—1st City of London Rifles, Major Verner—28th Middlesex (London Irish). 3rd Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Whitehead—2nd Middlesex (Victoria) Rifles; (Hornsey Rifles); 4th Middlesex, Major Hill—21st Middlesex (Civil Service); 26th Middlesex; 30th Ditto; 38th Ditto; 43rd Ditto.

Third Brigade.—Lieutenant-Colonel Viscount Raneligh commanding; Major Tremayne, Inner Temple Rifles; Lieutenant-Colonel Lennard, C.B.—1st Post, Major of Brigade. 1st Battalion, Captain Atterbury—2nd Middlesex (Queen's Westminster), Major Bernard—5th Surrey; 6th Surrey, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir J. V. Shelley—6th Middlesex; 2nd City of London; 4th Ditto. 4th Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Somerset—1st Middlesex (Central London Rifle Rangers). 5th Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Wood—5th Middlesex; 24th Ditto.

Fourth Brigade.—Lieutenant-Colonel Biggs commanding; Captain Jones, 20th Regiment, Major of Brigade. 1st Battalion, Major Lee—1st Surrey (South London); 16th Surrey; 1st Surrey. 2nd Battalion, Major Sir Thomas Gladstone—1st Administrative battalion, Sussex. 2nd Battalion, Major M. Beresford—7th Surrey; 19th Surrey. 4th Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Ranelagh—1st Surrey; 2nd Surrey; 3rd Surrey; 8th Surrey; 17th Surrey; 23rd Surrey.

Fifth Brigade.—Lieutenant-Colonel Brewster commanding; Captain Wardell, 2nd Regiment, Major of Brigade. 1st Battalion, Major Lord Ranelagh—2nd Middlesex; 3rd City of London. 2nd Battalion, Captain Lysley—2nd Middlesex (Inns of Court). 3rd Battalion, Major Le Marchant—1st Tower Hamlets; 4th Tower Hamlets. 5th Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Capper—2nd Administrative Battalion, Sussex. 6th Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Sturdee, composed as follows:—1st Administrative Battalion, East Sussex Artillery; 2nd Sussex Artillery; 3rd Sussex Artillery; 2nd Middlesex Artillery; 2nd Surrey Artillery; and 1st City of London Artillery.

In the second division, which was commanded by Major-General Sutton, were the following troops:—

First Brigade.—Lieutenant-Colonel Hood and Radstock commanding; Major Shaw, R.A., Major of Brigade. 1st Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel J. Wilkinson—2nd Administrative Battalion, Middlesex. 2nd Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel J. Barbour—19th Middlesex. 3rd Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel H. Lumsden—1st Middlesex (Victoria) Rifles; (Hornsey Rifles); 4th Middlesex; 9th (West) Middlesex.

Second Brigade.—Lieutenant-Colonel Dunsmure commanding. 1st Battalion, Captain T. Fenner—1st Hants; 2nd Hants; 16th Hants. 2nd Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel L. Cumin—3rd Administrative Battalion, Sussex. 3rd Battalion, Major Sir J. Simeon—1st Administrative Battalion, Isle of Wight. 4th Battalion, Captain H. Fowler—1st Administrative Battalion, Dorset.

Third Brigade.—Lieutenant-Colonel Morrison commanding. 1st Battalion, Major R. Crofton—2nd Administrative Battalion, Sussex. 2nd Battalion, Major R. Lucas—1st Administrative Battalion, Sussex. 3rd Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Gage—1st Administrative Battalion, Sussex. 4th Battalion, Major Sir J. Shelley—1st Administrative Battalion, Sussex.

Fourth Brigade.—Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Chichester commanding; Major the Hon. D. Baird—13th Middlesex. 1st Battalion, Major Sir J. Shelley—1st Middlesex (Victoria) Rifles; 6th, and 2nd City of London. 2nd Battalion, Colonel Barrow—23rd Middlesex; 3rd Hampshire. 3rd Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord G. Fitzgerald—20th Middlesex; 1st Middlesex (Queen's). 4th Battalion.

The cavalry and artillery, whose rendezvous was behind the Grand Stand, were brigaded as follow:—

The Cavalry Brigade.—The 9th (Queen's Royal) Lancers, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Eyvaile, C.B.; the 1st Essex Light Horse, under the command of Captain Bower; and a detachment of Light Cavalry of the Hon. Artillery Company to act as orderlies.

The two Artillery Brigades were under the control of Colonel Ormsby. The First Brigade, commanded by Lord Truro, consisted of the Hon. Artillery Company's Horse Artillery, two 6-pounders; and Field Battery, four 6-pounders. 1st Middlesex Artillery, four 12-pounders. 2nd Middlesex Artillery, four 18-pounders. The Second Brigade, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel J. Estridge, consisted of the 1st Sussex Artillery, four 6-pounders and six 18-pounders; 3rd Sussex Artillery, four 18-pounders; and 4th Cinque Ports Artillery, two 18-pounders. Total, 80 guns.

The marching past presented, as usual, many subjects of interest to professional as well as to non-military observers. A year had passed since the same corps had undergone similar criticism. But in that time, although much improvement might have been observed, nothing like determinate progress was visible, and the cheapest of 1862—the Inns of Court, the London Scottish, the City of London, and the Robin Hood Rifles—were not found to have lost their pre-eminence in 1863. Their appearance was greeted by the usual cheers with a welcome which, while it was denied to none, broke out into greater enthusiasm as each successive volunteer corps came. The London and London Scottish corps took a large share of the honours of the reception. The Queen's Light Cavalry, whose appointments and drill have met with Colonel M'Murdo's express approbation, were warmly received; while the sight of Lord Ranelagh riding at the head of his brigade raised the storm of applause.

But the great feature of last Monday's review was the large force of artillery which, in addition to the regular force, was present on the Middlesex Artillery, with their eight 18-pounders, the four 6-pounders, two 18-pounder guns of the 1st Sussex Artillery, and four of the Cinque Ports Artillery with their guns. The Artillery Brigade was also drawn by six horses—those of the Middlesex Artillery being supplied from Pickford's stud, while the guns of the Sussex and Cinque Ports Artillery were drawn by plough horses and driven by country carters in smock-frocks, who encouraged the steeds to emulate the celerity of the Hon. Artillery Company's movements.

The invading force was commanded, as before, by Colonel Brewster, of the Inns of Court Corps, by whom, in addition to his own troops, were allotted the Garrison Brigade, 32nd Middlesex, 3rd London, 4th and 5th Tower Hamlets, and 2nd Administrative Battalion, Essex, with two batteries of artillery. The gallant Colonel, who throughout played a losing game with great dash and judgment, was supposed to have landed upon the coast and to be marching upon Brighton, when he was met by a superior hostile force. At once retiring upon his reserves, he took up a position behind a brewster intrenched himself in the orchard and outbuildings of a large farmhouse known as Hollingbury Camp, and became the key of the position, and otherwise disposed his men so as best to meet the withering fire of heavy guns that was directed upon him. To storm Woodendean Farm became the first object of importance, and, while the 1st City of London Rifles that gallant officer at once led his brigade to the task before him, and, by a series of skilful movements, drove the enemy's skirmishers from their shelter and into a position where they were exposed perilously to the fire of the guns, which had now come into action, and were arrayed against them. The inferior force, compelled to retreat, kept their faces steadily to their foes, and gave ground slowly, step by step. Meanwhile the Duke of the Hants Light Infantry had been manœuvred to have placed themselves in imminent peril. Passing between two fires, and exposed to the concentrated fire of both, their efforts to advance as they galloped by with all the excitement of a real contest, they came at last upon the Inns of Court Battalion, and the Inns of Court Artillery were close upon them, poured in a tremendous volley at point blank which would have emptied every saddle. With this the hardly contested fight for the day was held to have come to an end, the Invaders, satisfied with the stand he had made, retiring in the direction of the Devil's Dyke, and the cavalry and artillery also withdrawing from the enemy's cavalry who hung persistently upon his flank to convert his orderly retreat into a rout.

So terminated the Easter Monday review of 1863. The railway authorities exerted themselves so effectually that, with no very important delay, the various corps were conveyed to their homes with as much punctuality and expedition as they had in the morning been brought to the scene of action. It is to be regretted, indeed, to be assured that the railway companies could, with equal ease and certainty, have transported fifty thousand men to the same spot.

In conclusion, we need scarcely add our meed of compliment or praise to the volunteers. As a force they are, of course, regarded, as a pastime of peace, labours which they will be just as ready to undergo if need be as a duty to the gravest exercise of the soldier's calling. Our volunteers gone far to render any more serious exercise of their fighting qualities unnecessary. But, in small proportion to what we have so much to lose, to be assured, upon the faith of official reports, that, in one branch of the service alone, we have numbers and skill enough to meet the best of the artillery practice of the best of regular troops. Of the artillery alone who made so gratifying a display at Brighton in the Easter Monday review, the substitution of one hundred orphans to the benefit of the asylum during the year.

A letter from Weimar states that a valuable discovery has just been made in the archives of the ducal library, under the house of Saxony. It consists of a great number of letters, hitherto unknown, some written by Luther, and others addressed to him. The discovery, in course of the archives, is occupied with the publication of those documents, which are considered to be of the highest interest.

Among our list of the bridal presents made to her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, we have omitted the beautiful old shawls, manufactured by Claiborn, Sons, and Crisp, of Norwich, and given by the Mayor and Corporation of that city. The gift was accepted by her Royal Highness should have been mentioned. These shawls, for which the manufacturers received the Prize Medal at the Great Exhibition, and a special medal from the International, were intended to serve the purposes of a bridal shawl, a full-dress shawl, and an opera shawl.

From Mr. Hyde Clarke, says the Athenæum, we have news of the discovery, at Sanoe, of the foundation of the famous Temple of Juno, Benavissima, which was long since confounded by Strabo for the Berlin Museum. Nothing of value turned up for the Prussian Collection, but the enquiry has led to the discovery of a number of bronzes, discovered in ancient time as one of the seven wonders, so as to develop to a large extent the Greek, that is, the Hellenic, style. Many of the bronzes were found about 12 feet below the surface; they are numerous and of gigantic size.

THE CHARLESTON Courier of March 7 says that the Confederate correspondent of the Mobile Register writes as follows:—"The struggle, when it comes, will not only be of a fearful character, but it will be one of tremendous forces, the relative powers of which are yet untried. The longboasted ironclads of the enemy are to be put to the severest practical test brought to a test more conclusive than any to which human warfare has yet subjected it. We are fully prepared to encounter them, and have reason to be the most impenetrable vessels ever constructed will necessarily come to pieces under the fire of our guns. Our experience in naval warfare has taught us that the most experienced pilots often run their vessels ashore, or run them foul of each other, or otherwise disable them, so that we cannot escape, etc.—without light. Our hardest work is yet to be done. Even when the blockade-running vessels are harbour it will be necessary to aid their exit by previously-arranged lights (shades) and signals; so that it is reasonably certain that the attacking ironclads must either enter in open day or incur the imminent hazard of getting aground upon one of the most treacherous bars on the Southern coast, which seldom yields a vessel when once it has grasped the keel. But if, perchance, despite of many chances, multiplied torpedoes, and the combined batteries of the forts, some of the nine Monitors should chance to get into port, they would still have to encounter a concentrated fire of other batteries, which, as the Yankee papers have learned from experience, "has the nasty habit of hitting the nail on the head." We will come the 'ting of war' which will determine the position of the honoured old city."

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

COFFINS IN THE HUMAN FORM.

ATTENTION has lately been drawn to several remarkable instances of buried in coffins of the human form—a mode of sepulture in England of considerable antiquity. Double leaden coffins—not of plain lead, but folded in a very curious, handsome manner—occur in the Anglo-Saxon era; and at Farley Castle are some adapted to the form of the body, like the cases of mummies, and bearing on the upper part the figure of a human face in flat relief.

REMAINS OF DR. W. HARVEY, "LAPT IN LEAD."

A leaden coffin of this description was, early last year, discovered at Worcester Cathedral, and described to the British Archæological Association by Mr. Georges Godwin, F.R.S., F.S.A. At the same meeting Mr. Pettigrew, F.S.A., exhibited a drawing of the coffin of Dr. W. Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood, whose body, in the olden phrase, is "lapt in lead." Harvey died in 1657. "He was buried," says Mr. Pettigrew, "in the ancient mausoleum of the Medical Portrait Gallery," "in a vault belonging to his family, built by his brother Eliab, at Hempstead, in Essex, where a handsome monument is erected to his memory." A writer attended his funeral, and says,—"Hee lobpt to carry him into the vault: that he is lapt in lead, and on the coffin in great letter Dr. William Harvey." This statement is perfectly correct, and Harvey's coffin is the first in the vault along with other members of his family. The shape is similar to a rectangular box of an Egyptian mummy, but by a thumbed form without the appearance of the arms. It is entirely of lead, but there is no wooden cover, and literally on the breast is the name of the deceased, a fillet, inscribed by order, and the addition of the date of his decease—"The 3rd of June, 1657, aged seventy-nine years." The letters in which the inscription is written are those to be met with on various leaden pumps, cisterns, &c., of the 17th century. Mr. Pettigrew, engraved the sketch of Harvey "lapt in lead."

Mr. Syer Cuming, at the general meeting of the British Archæological Association, referred to other instances in which leaden coffins have been found. Among those were those were of James IV. of Scotland, buried at the monastery of Sheen in 1513; of Mary, Countess of Arundel, in the chapel formerly belonging to the College of the Holy Trinity in Arundel, in 1557; of Henry VII., who was buried in a vault on the north side of Henry VII.'s Chapel at Westminster, in 1612; and of Thomas Sackville, first Lord Buckhurst, and Earl of Dorset, who died in 1611. This example is very singular; for on its upper part is a mask with a square Egyptian beard, as seen on the mummy-cases, having an Osirian character.

CHELSEA BUN HOUSE, described in our Journal of last week, has given name to one of Miss Manning's novels, published in 1854.

TREASURE-TROVE.—In the recent goldfinding in East Sussex, reported in our Journal of last week, the coroner's circumstances are—1, that the gold was first sold by the finders as old brass, but was recognised as gold by a salesman who had been a goldigger in California; 2, that the finders had not given notice of the matter, the power of making the investigation being vested, according to 4th Edward VI., cap. 2, in the concealment of treasure trove from the Sovereign was formerly a capital offence. At the present day it is a misdemeanour, punishable by fine and imprisonment.

THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.—In the report of Mr. Bazalgette, engineer, descriptive of designs for the Thames Embankment (north shore), we are glad to find that the very objectionable, and disfigurative structure being restored, after many years' neglect.

LOTTERY.—For some account of the obituary of the Times has recorded some rare instances of old age. On March 31, the deaths, among others, of six persons, whose united ages amounted to 519 years, or an average of 86½ years. The aged 6 months and 5 days being women, the youngest being 82, and two numbering 91 years each. The gentleman who died on April 1 the deaths, according to that of seven persons are given whose united ages amounted to 611 years, or an average of 87 years 3 months and 12 days; and again the ladies take the lead, three of the deaths of the six being females, the youngest being a man (82), and the oldest a lady, reaching the great age of 91 years.

EASTER CUSTOM.—At Twickenham was anciently observed the custom of dividing two great cakes in the church on Easter Day, which, being locked up in the church, the other, which was distributed by Parliament, in 1645, that the parishioners should, instead, buy with the money loaves to be given to the poor. This, according to some, is one pound's worth of penny loaves is distributed to poor children on the Thursday after Easter. They were formerly thrown from the church tower, to be scrambled for.

BOSCOBEL OAKS IN HYDE PARK.—The trees from two acorns from the Boscobel oak were planted by Charles II. in Hyde Park, grew at the north side of the Serpentine, just where the road turns off by the magazine towards Bayswater. For many years they were fenced in, but are now missing, the other, which was the smaller, was removed in 1854.—Davies's Memorials of Knightsbridge.

THE LAST BRITISH PARLIAMENT PERSON form a very interesting portion of historical biography. "The reason," says Addison, "I take to be this: because there is no other single circumstance in the history of any single person which can possibly be the case of every one who reads it."

THE ROYAL SOCIETY last year attained the two hundredth year of its existence. The term of incorporation was granted on April 22, 1662, by Charles II. The second charter is dated 1663. Among the early occurrences of the society of claiming the lives of criminals executed at Tyburn, which were to be executed at Gresham College. The experiments were chiefly "anatomical," consisting of repetitions of researches already made in private; it is stated that Mr. Boyle was so frequently engaged upon these experiments that he had to write some of his letters in bed. "Some of them," he says, "I cannot be spoken with to-day." The first charter, in Latin, has the following initials, initialed portrait of Charles II., with an indian-ink. The charter empowers the president to wear his hat while in the chair. The charter also empowers the president to have headed till he made a sign for them to put on their hats, customs now obsolete. The hat also formerly played an important part at the Society of Arbitrators' meetings. The method of admission being by the president or presiding officer placing upon his head a cocked hat, which was then thrown quit more in one hand, and with the other welcoming the new fellow.

CHANGE OF NAME.—In the debate upon this subject, in Parliament, on the 3rd of March, Lord Grey stated that it appears to be the usage at the Home Office in dealing with applications for the change of name, there being no written law on the subject:—About two hundred years ago, the practice of applying for permission to change names arose; and in 1753, in consequence of the frequency of those requests, it was deemed necessary to put some check on them. A regulation was, therefore, made that all cases should be referred to the College of Arms. That regulation is not, however, necessarily decisive, as it is intended only for the information of the department. That usage has been universally adopted, subject to the modification introduced by Sir Robert Peel, that where there are no plausible grounds for an application, and it is obviously the mere result of whim or caprice, it should be refused without any reference to the College of Arms, leaving it to the applicant to change his name on his own responsibility.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

His Grace, Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Grafton, in the county of Northampton, Earl of Arlington and Euston, Viscount Thetford and Viscount Ipswich, Baron Arlington of Arlington, in the county of Middlesex, and Baron Sudbury, in the county of Suffolk, in the peerage of England, Hereditary Keeper of Whittlebury Forest, Northamptonshire, and Ranger of Salcey Forest, both in the county of Northampton, Henry Fitzroy, K.G., Duke and Earl of Grafton, by his wife, Lady Charlotte Maria Waldegrave, second daughter of James, second Earl Waldegrave, and his wife Maria, afterwards

Duchess of Gloucester. He was born on the 10th of February, 1790, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1814. For some years before he inherited the family honours and estates, in the Parliament of 1826 to 1830, and from 1828 to 1830, and from 1841 to 1846, represented the University of Cambridge. He was formerly allied with the Whig party, but he sat in the House of Commons from 1812 to 1828, as a Tory, and was Thetford from 1814 to 1844. He invariably sided with the Ministry of the day, and was never a factious voter. He was always a supporter of the constitutional measures and policy of Peel. He was always a supporter of the constitutional measures and policy of Peel. He was always a supporter of the dukedom and other family honours on the death of his father, Sept. 28, 1844. He married, June 29, 1817, Eliza Susan Joliffe, daughter of Mr. Joliffe, of Merrow, in the county of Surrey, and by her, who survives him, he has issue three sons and two daughters—whom, who survives him, he has issue three sons and two daughters—whom, who survives him, he has issue three sons and two daughters—whom

SANDRINGHAM CHURCH.

THE Prince and Princess of Wales have, during their sojourn at his Royal Highness's estate in Norfolk, attended Divine service at the parish church of Sandringham, and on each occasion not only has the church been crowded to its utmost capacity, but a number of persons have been unable to obtain admittance. Sandringham Church has, within a few years, been thoroughly repaired, under the care of Mr. Teulon, and it is one of the most pleasing in the county. It has a nave, a chancel, and a tower at the west end; and is built of carstone, a kind of ironstone found on the Sandringham estate. There are four windows in the nave—two with painted glass by Clayton, and two with subjects in outline by Wilmshurst. The window in the tower is also by Wilmshurst. The east window, in the chancel, and two lancet windows, cusped, on the south side, are of painted glass by Clayton. The seats are open, modern, and of oak; the pulpit is of stone, and the reading-desk of oak. Here and there, throughout the church, are religious sentences and devices. It is paved with Minton's tiles, quite plain, and laid in pattern. The Rev. G. B. Moxon is the Rector of Sandringham parish.

THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE BOAT-RACE: THE WINNING CREW COMING ASHORE.

OUR Engraving represents the somewhat rough landing of the Oxford crew after their gallant and successful match on the 28th ult. Upon nearing shore their boat was found to have made so much water as to be in a sinking state, and the order "Sauve qui peut!" being given by the coxswain, who himself set the example of obeying it, the winning crew left their boat and scrambled through the water to land, amid the hearty congratulations of their friends.

THE OTTOMAN EXHIBITION, CONSTANTINOPLE.

THIS exhibition of the fine arts of the East was opened on Friday, the 27th of February, by his Imperial Majesty the Sultan, at Stamboul, in the presence of a large gathering of Mussulmans and Christians who had assembled to witness the inaugural ceremony.

On reaching the great square of At-Meidan, near the celebrated mosque of Sultan Achmet, the Sultan alighted, and was received by Mustapha Pasha, the president of the Exhibition Commission. Attended by the Viceroy of Egypt, the Grand Vizier, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Seraskier, the Sedar-akrem, and several of the palace officials, his Majesty proceeded to the dais prepared for him at the southern end of the building. Hairi Effendi, the chief mollah of the palace, then read a long prayer invoking the blessing of Heaven on his Majesty, the Government, the Ottoman dominions, and the exhibition. To this the whole assembled multitude having responded with a loud "Amin!" the Sultan advanced a few steps and declared the building opened.

Though the contents of the building are far from being complete, the Exhibition is well worth a visit. It covers an area of 5600 yards, and is in shape an oblong parallelogram, with two side aisles and two courts at the south end inclosing one large central court. The dead lateral and end lines of the building are broken by wide alcoves, which, forming so many courts, serve to relieve the flat mural uniformity, and to facilitate the classification of the articles exhibited. The floor of the central court, which is sunk some 2 ft. below that of the rest of the building, is tastefully laid out as a flower parterre, having in its centre a handsome marble fountain, while on each side stand a couple of rifled field-pieces with their ammunition-limbers, contributed by the Imperial foundry at Zeitoun-bourno.

With regard to the architecture of the building, no one style has been adhered to; but, as in the columns and arches of the interior, a kind of Composite Mauresque predominates. The portico is dietyle, with the bases of its pillars painted green, the shafts red, and the capitals white, the body colour of the building being of a light buff. Next over these stretches an oblong panel, having the words "Serghi Osmanea" (the Turkish Exhibition) in gilt letters on a green ground; and above this, completing the elevation, rises a heavy Mauresque cornice with ornamental mouldings. Taken as a whole, the building contrasts most favourably with the heavy structure of the Mosque of Achmet, near which it stands; and great praise is due to Monsieur Bourgeois, the architect, for the good taste he has displayed in rearing this interesting little temple of industry, especially when it is remembered that the Turks are most provokingly opposed to anything in the form of innovation, even in the way of improvement.

We are indebted for the Sketch from which our Engraving is taken to Signor Fenzoni, of Constantinople; and for the above description to an English resident in the same city.

THE ANGLO-CHINESE FLEET.—Three ships belonging to the little fleet now fitting out for the service of the Government of China have already sailed—the Pekin, the China, and the Amoy; the first two despatch-vessels, and the third a gun-boat of light draught. Three others, of which one is a despatch-vessel and two are gun-boats, will almost immediately be completed by the contractors. Some other vessels are being built in America; but all are heavily-armed seagoing craft, able to buffet with the tempests of either of the stormy Capes. There are others of a lighter draught and more tender construction, intended for the narrower and shallower of the inland waters, which are to be constructed at Whampoa. When united these vessels, of which the largest is a despatch-vessel and the smallest a tiny river-steamer, will form a very respectable mosquito fleet. They have been all built and armed under the immediate eye of Captain Osborn.—Times.

THE OTTOMAN EXHIBITION BUILDING, CONSTANTINOPLE

PRESENTS TO THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

THE BOUQUET AND HOLDER PRESENTED BY THE LADY MAYORESS.

The bouquet presented by the Lady Mayoress to Princess Alexandra, as her Royal Highness passed the Mansion House on her way through the City on the 7th ult., was made to represent the Danish colours, and was composed of roses, carnations, stephanotus, with moss-rose buds peeping up between white lilac and lilies of the valley. It was arranged by Mr. Harding, of Maddox-street.

The holder is of ornamental form, and reflects much credit on its manufacturers, Messrs. Garrard and Co. It is ornamented with the rose of England, composed of rubies and diamonds; with the harp of Ireland, formed of diamonds; and with the thistle of Scotland, composed of rubies and diamonds. The holder bears the following inscription:—"Presented to H.R.H. the Princess Alexandra of Denmark by Grace Rose, Lady Mayoress of the city of London, March 7, 1863."

Our Engraving of the bouquet and holder is from a photograph taken by the London Stereoscopic and Photographic Company.

PRESENT FROM THE LADIES OF LIVERPOOL.

The ladies of Liverpool presented to her Royal Highness a cross composed of eleven fine brilliants, weighing one hundred grains, with a loop of three smaller brilliants attached to a necklace of fine oriental pearls, having a diamond clasp. This gift was presented by 843 ladies, who subscribed over £1000. It was purchased of Mr. Mayer, Liverpool.

ROYAL BRIDECAKE.

One of the Royal bridecakes was prepared by Mr. Bolland, of Chester, and was a splendid specimen of confectionery art. It was made in three tiers of cakes. Around the base were festoons composed of the Rose, Thistle, and Shamrock, intwined with the Royal and Danish arms. On the tiers were placed alternately reflectors and figures of seraphs with harps, also satin flags with miniature likenesses of the Prince and Princess. The whole was surmounted by a temple embedded in orange-blossoms and silver leaves, upon the summit of which was placed a Cupid supporting the Prince's coronet and a plume of ostrich feathers. The cake was of colossal proportions, standing nearly five feet high.

THE MAGAZINES.

Blackwood for this month is, as usual, very well worth reading as a whole, and, as usual, comes out with one article which throws the rest into the shade. The exceptional performance this time is "The Tsang-Tai Mountains, and Spirit-writing in China," which contains a most curious (unfortunately not first-hand) account of "Spiritualism," as the ingenious Celestials have practised it for ages. Like Mr. Home, the mediums are very particular that the séances shall take place after dark, and that the spectators shall attend "in a proper frame of mind." But in one respect they have greatly the advantage of Western necromancers, inasmuch as the messages are written down through the agency of persons ensnared of the art of writing. This is, indeed, something like demonstration, and we trust our mediums will see the propriety of emulating it, since, on the hypothesis of direct supernatural interference, it can manifestly make no difference to the spirit whether the hand he guides belongs to an instructed or an uninstructed person. The accompanying excursions seem to be of a really romantic and poetical character, very different to our vulgarities. The entire paper is entertaining and instructive. We learn, for instance, that Hong-Kong means "fragrant streams" (query channels?). The trail of the sanguinary is simply critical. Sensation Diplomacy in Japan is merely a review; as is the paper on Sir Sir James Graham; so is that on Spedding's Bacon, the Work of an able writer, but disposed to bear too heavily on Bacon both as a philosopher and a man; so is "The Inexhaustible Capital." But here Mr. Story's genial book has fallen into congenial hands, and the article is very lively and amusing. The novelette "Mrs. Clifford's Marriage," is wound up in a style to justify warm praise and sanguine expectations of the author. The dullness of "Curtonina," on the other hand, manifests that the Pieistratus vein of Sir E. Bulwer's comprehensive, but not very profound, intellect is totally worked out, and that the sooner he betakes himself to some other department the better for his reputation and his readers.

Fraser is below the mark this month, and indebted for so much brilliancy as it has to the capricious coruscations of Mr. Ruskin. Remembering how bitterly the gentleman's economical crudities were assailed not long since in this very magazine, it seems passing strange that it should now be the medium of publishing greater extravagances rather than in the intensity or acuteness which constitutes its most ordinary manifestation in these days. There is almost a "Grandison" air about this noble work, something which repels popularity by hall fatiguing, half intimidating, the ordinary reader. It is the literary counterpart of Ingres' paintings or Gluck's music; and, compared with Mr. Trollope's pleasant negligence, it is as a Queen's throne to an easy-chair. Mr. Trollope has seldom been more rambling and desultory than in his present story, but he is all the more lifelike, and one has much the same sort of pleasure in skimming his clever pages as in turning the leaves of a photographic album. Poco chosea face; the apparent cohesion is merely the work of the binder; but every feature is from life. "A Run through the Southern States" is a singularly graphic and genial paper, the work of a British officer, but old a campaigner to be put out of temper by petty inconveniences, and whose varied experience of life seems to have divested him pretty effectually of the shell of prejudice in which the British tourist is most commonly ensconced. Like all military men who have visited the States, he speaks most highly of the universal civility and goodwill of the people, North and South, but lends no countenance to the bombastic descriptions of Southern military organisation which are rife in society. Federal and Confederate soldiers are very much alike—brave enough, and well-drilled, but with hazy notions of meum and tuum, and a native jocosity and independence which are perpetually carrying them beyond the bounds of discipline, as martinets understand it. "Oaths" is one of those long, casuistical papers peculiar to the Cornhill, while "Life in a Barrack" and "Corpulence" belong to that better class of agreeable essays, crowded with information pleasantly disguised, of which this magazine has also almost a monopoly. The Roundabout Paper cannot have taxed Mr. Thackeray's powers very severely. The poetry is decidedly queer this month, and the illustrations are not much better.

Macmillan is also in great force. The best contribution, and, indeed, the gem of the magazine literature of the month, is Mr. Goldschmidt's beautiful story of Danish life, intrinct with pure feeling no less healthy than delicate. The reader will assert we must place the racy Highland sketch by John Bull, junior, whom it is easy to identify with an author of deserved fame. It is a pleasure to read anything so redolent of animal spirits and the innocent enjoyment of country life. Mr. Hare's seasonable suggestions for the government of the metropolis will command attention, as proceeding from a practical thinker and philosophic statesman. Dr. Hamilton contributes some highly characteristic marginalia from volumes acquired at the sale of Lord Macaulay's library; and Miss Mulock supplies a most kindly and sympathetic, as well as interesting, account of the "Jewish free-schools at Spitalfields." "Sunken Rocks," after being long a dead-weight upon the magazine, kindles all at once into interest. We seem likely to assist at a domestic tragedy of the most painful nature, wrought out between the aspiring Vincenzo on the one hand and his well-conditioned but bigoted and stupid little wife on the other. Mr. Rufini's Rose is a perfect counterpart to Rosie in "The Newcomes," and seems created to illustrate Mr. Thackeray's favourite maxim that virtue may, under certain circumstances, be more mischievous and intolerable than villany itself. The lines entitled, "Be just, and fear not," posed us entirely till we discovered that they emanated from the Dean of Canterbury; that the said dignitary believes exactly what he ought, not one scruple too much or too little, and that he was thanking Heaven for these gratifying circumstances with a suspicious smack of self-righteousness and a fervour so intense as to be quite ludicrous.

Everything in the Dublin University is agreeable, but also mediocre, unless we except the essay on Irish ballad poetry, which contains several specimens of those laughably pretentious translations, yet really lyrical and not wholly unpoetical, compositions of which "The Groves of Blarney" affords the best-known type, and which could only have arisen in a country where the spoken language was virtually forbidden to express the habits of thought, a foreign tongue to the majority of the people. One of these pieces, however, "Gra-ma-chree," is in a totally different vein, and is as exquisite an example of simple feeling as could easily be found. Another is astonishingly, though absurdly, like Campbell's well-known ballad, "Light-read false" Fashioned to leave a lovely notion." Mr. Irwin's elegant poetical contribution enriches our language with a new word. A certain river, according to him, runs wooplong.

Bentley's Miscellany presents nothing worthy of remark; nor does Good Words, albeit a marvellous expensyworth, altogether attain its average standard of excellence.

We hope the conductors of the Churchman's Family Magazine are not going to try how far substantial dimensions, excellent paper and print, and, generally, admirable illustrations, will reconcile the public to habitual inferiority in the literary department. "Besides, you have views on Church matters with which I fear I could scarcely coincide," may be a very natural speech in the mouth of the Bishop of Oxford, but comes very oddly from that of Dr. Norman's Beckett.

London Society is, as usual, light, frothy, and palatable, lavishly and excellently illustrated; and this month almost every paper relates, directly or indirectly, to the Royal marriage. It is practically a ladies' magazine, and deserves recommendation as decidedly the best of its class.

THE THEATRES.

ST. JAMES'S.—EASTER AMUSEMENTS.

On the whole, the Easter season at the theatres and other places of amusement commenced with spirit, and in a manner highly creditable to the different managements. Many of the theatres were open during Passion Week, or part of it. Among the latter we may mention the HAYMARKET, on account of Mr. Robson's benefit, which took place on Wednesday. In addition to the character of Lord Dundreary, Mr. Robson also appeared as Windsor Brown, in Mr. Maddison Morton's farce of "Away with Melancholy," and gave as many new points to the part that no longer any doubt can exist that this eccentric actor is capable of an extensive range of characters, and we may reasonably entertain the hope that we may yet witness him as an illustrator of the drama generally.

DRURY LANE.—Mr. Falconer, with an enterprise which does him credit, reproduced on Monday his very successful drama of "Deep Calls to Deep," on a scale commensurate with the capacities of the national theatre. The occasion caused the 3,973rd time of its performance. The reproduction presents many new points, both in regard to the cast and the getting-up. In regard to the former we may state that Mr. S. Calhoun is substituted by Mr. Charles Vincent as Lieutenant Wade, and that Mr. Carlton supports the part of Harry Kavanagh with spirit and dignity. Miss Cleveland deserves especial welcome as Kathleen, and Mr. Graham, as Jack Dalton, characteristic. The scenery, by Messrs. Grieve and Telbin, is excellent. For the afterpiece the farce of "Magic Toys" was selected, in which Miss Lydia Thompson proved as attractive as usual.

HAYMARKET.—A new candidate for popular favour made her appearance on Monday at this theatre. The comedy of "Much Ado About Nothing" was performed, and the character of Beatrice sustained by Miss Louise Angel. This young lady is, perhaps, too young for a part of so much weight and point, yet she contrived to make her mark in it, and, notwithstanding her apparent juvenility, impressed the audience most favourably. Mr. Howe performed Benedict, and Miss Ellen Terry Hero, with considerable effect. After the play followed a farce, called "Mr. Buckstone at Home," written by Mr. Stirling Coyne, as an introduction to an extensive panorama, painted by Mr. Telbin and his son, and Mr. T. Grieve. The introduction is nearly as extensive as the panorama, being filled to repletion with allegorical characters, representing the different classes of drama, and sometimes individualising the dramatis personæ, forming a complex totality, abundant in that species of fusile wit for which the writer is celebrated. Mr. and Mrs. Keeley, and Mr. Coe were especially happy in their imitations of Mr. C. Kean and Mr. Fechter. The panorama represents the tour of the Prince of Wales in the East, and connects itself with his recent marriage at Windsor, and is accompanied with music selected from David, Rossini, and Beethoven. Among the prominent scenes are Cairo, the Grand Bazaar; the Temple of Isis at Philæ; Jerusalem, including the Mosque of Omar, Mount Zion, the Golden Gate, and the Mount of Olives; the Pool of the Jordan; the Dead Sea, and the mountains of Kurumful; Nazareth, with the Latin Convent; the Sea of Galilee (viewed from the Castle of Safed), and Mount Hermon. More elaborate combinations also were effected, such as the courtyard of a house in Damascus, with a crowd of Mohamedans listening to an Arabian improvisator; the ruins of the Temples of the Sun and Jupiter, at Baalbec; Bayrouth, with Lebanon in the distance; and Constantinople, as seen across the Golden Horn. These pictures were undertaken at the suggestion of Mr. Buckstone, and will bring much credit and profit alike to him and the artists engaged. Their beauty and their appropriateness to the time will certainly conduce to their having a prolonged run.

PRINCESS'.—After the drama of "Aurora Floyd," which still continues exceedingly attractive, two new pieces were produced on Monday. The first was a farce, Mr. Maddison Morton's clever "Killing Time," and afforded opportunity for the appearance of Mr. George Vining, who has become Mr. Lindley's partner in the management of the theatre. The action of the little piece is almost confined to Miss Sedgwick and Mr. Vining, one of whom is the lover having to court the peculiarly-wife for six weeks. Lady Millicent Mayduke, pained at Mr. Vining's coldness, and fearful of his departure, is equally suffering from ennui, gladly calls in a stranger who is seeking shelter from the storm, amuses herself with the unexpected visitor; but when she seeks to get rid of him finds it difficult. However, it turns out that he is a gentleman of fortune, and a suitor for her hand, so a happy conclusion is suddenly put to the little dilemma. The farce was succeeded by a burlesque by Mr. H. J. Byron—founded on the story of "Jack Sunu," the ballad of "Lord Bateman," and the legend poem of "Lurline"—and entitled "Beautiful Haidee; or, the Bo'sun and the Ballet Dancer." The new piece, written by Mr. F. Lloyds, is admirably painted, and the artist was more than once summoned before the audience. The piece itself is a clever piece of nonsense, drawn from the poem, the ballad, and the legend above mentioned, abounding with puns and punning jests. It is effectively acted by Mr. Vining, who as Lord Bateman; Miss Hudspeth, as his tiger; Mr. C. Seyton, as Lambro, Haidee's father; Mr. G. Belmore, as Desperado, the pirate; Miss Mc Intosh, as Haidee; and Mrs. Selby, as Mrs. Sticcers, or Coralie, a sea-nymph. The burlesque was perfectly successful.

OLYMPIC.—A new classical burlesque by Mr. F. C. Burnand, called "Ixion; or, the Rake's Progress," was produced on Monday. To those who recollect Mr. Macready's getting-up of this subject description is needless. It was magnificent, and the most striking scene was that marvellous production. Of the acting it is impossible to speak too highly. Miss Hughes, both in her singing and dancing, was admirable; and Miss Annie Kemp, an American actress, showed herself to be a well-practised artiste. Much commendation is also due to Miss Carr, as Phyllis, and to Miss Lavine, as Juno, who filled with so much indifference. The scenery is painted by the Messrs. Telbin and shows their usual power. The treatment of fate elicited from this pastoral subject is perhaps the most noticeable element in the production. It is certainly wonderful both in its scope and propriety.

STRAND.—Mr. Byron, on Monday, placed on the boards of this small but elegant theatre a new version of an old subject, under the title of "All Is Fair; or, the Temptress." In the concluding scene with the author's well-known habit of taking one off." The story is too well known to require more than a mere allusion. The introduction was an unquestionable success, and will command frequent audiences.

ST. JAMES'S.—Mr. William Brough, too, has taken a well-known subject for his Easter extravaganza, which is called "The Great Sensation Novel; or, Circumstantial Edits Reads." The new scenery, the new costumes, and the effective company, including Miss Mary Witton and Mr. James Rogers, were more than sufficient to secure a decisive success. The make-up of the latter for Edie Ducas is one of the most remarkable things on the modern stage.

SADLER'S WELLS.—This theatre opened on Monday in the resumption of the legitimate drama, to be supported by Mr. Herman Vezin and Mrs. Charles Young. On Monday the performance commenced with "As You Like It"—the part of Rosalind being effectively rendered by the above-named lady. It is to be hoped, now that a completed house has been given to the company, that the success that some efforts worthy of its reputation under Mr. Greenwood's management may be made, and some portion of their liberal support extended to these boards—a other way can this theatre, from its peculiar situation, be rendered successful.

SURREY.—The management here has provided an Easter entertainment suitable to the season and most acceptable to the audience. It is a new sensation drama, most complicated in its plot and startling in its incidents. Its title is "Jessie Ashton; or, Leaden by Day and Night;" and we are told that the drama is founded upon fact, and that the scenes actually passed through. Its adventures and perils that are represented in its various scenes. To follow the plot thoroughly is almost impossible, as the main incidents are so sufficiently obvious. Jessie Ashton is beloved by the Squire of Greenwood's brother; but the Squire, determined that the marriage shall not take place, contrives for to be carried off by a gang of robbers, and, however, by an apparently dumb woman named Binnes, the sister of Sigmore Boswell, who is connected with the Squire and his brother, Blodrath, had years ago attempted her murder. In due time we find Jessie seeking refuge under the roof of Mr. Sigmore Boswell, where she is attacked by Phil Boulter, the villain who had undertaken her abduction; but she is delivered from his clutches by Ernest Beardon, the hero. Having been previously arrested by Sigmore, who detects Phil in a robbery; but the rascal sets fire to the house, and again the case is rescued by Ernest, who has also been introduced to the rigmore at a casino, where the lady contrives to pursue Captain De Vere with a view to entrap him. Martin Blodrath has also an enemy in his brother Joseph, who had been convicted for the attempt on the life of Binnes, though innocent of the crime, and who escaped from transportation. At last matters seem as though Ernest are about to be married, when the Squire reveals the fact that Jessie is already a mother, having been changed for another infant. Soon after Jessie is accused of murder, Binnes having stabbed Countess, and the latter supposed to be dead. However, the injured woman, by her signs, ultimately contrives to make her confession understood. Meanwhile Ernest enables Jessie to escape from prison, and the latter encounters Phil Boulter at London Docks, who throws him down with the cue of a boat; but he fires a pistol, which, striking the boat, causes the fall of a portal that Jessie should be saved by her lover. Then ensues a struggle for life and death between Martin and Joseph; but little daughter of the latter, who had been brought up by the former, interposes and effects their reconciliation. Such is this surprising drama, which has been placed on the boards with great care, and illustrated by scenery of the well-known artists of Westminster Bridge and Lambeth which deservedly commanded applause. The performance was energetically supported by the company engaged, and may fairly be regarded as a Surrey success.

AT the GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION Mrs. and Mr. German Reed, with Mr. Corney Du Furry, appeared in a new entertainment, called "A Charming Cottage." Mr. Andrew Halliday has furnished the book, which is a very pleasantly satisfactory one, and the music of these popular exhibitions to the greatest advantage. It was followed by "Mrs. Bonstead's Little Evening Party," in which Mr. John Parry, as usual, was triumphantly successful.

We have also Mr. Arthur Sketchley at the ST. JAMES'S HALL, whose "Quiet Morning" and "Mrs. Brown's Visit to the Play" continue to amuse a fashionable circle of admirers. In connection with the hall, we may likewise mention the Christy's Minstrels, whose entertainments were presented on Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Henri Drayton has been very successful at the POLY-GRAPHIC HALL with his new musical and pictorial entertainment of "Federals and Confederates," in which he gives his peculiar views of the American quarrel with considerable spirit. We may dissent from his opinions, but we not the less acknowledge the skill and cleverness of the delineation.

Mr. Edmund Yates has introduced an amusing novelty in his "Invitations" to the EGYPTIAN HALL. It is called "Twenty Minutes with a Medium," and forms altogether a capital exposé of the pseudo-spiritual manifestations which are so attractive to the numerous dupes of minds who revel in illusion and delight in mystery.

In the POLYTECHNIC GALLERY Mrs. Fanny Kemble renewed, on Monday, her "Shakespearean Readings" to a fashionable and appreciative audience.

ANOTHER NEW THEATRE.—The spirit of enterprise now sets in in the theatrical direction; and, as Mr. Bonicault has shown to the monied interest that theatres are among the most profitable of investments, more than one adventure of the kind may reasonably be expected. Accordingly we find that, in addition to the new theatre in the Haymarket, another is proposed in Holborn, the project of which a company has been formed and the site secured. The building will nearly cover an acre of ground, and is of the most splendid and elegant construction. It is intended to be built of iron. On this head the directors in their prospectus state that "at the late fire at the Plymouth Theatre the salvation after destruction may be attributed to the fact of its having an iron roof of peculiar formation." Thus they think a good reason for having the building entirely constructed of iron. A restaurant will be attached to the theatre, and it is stated that at any time refreshments of every description may be obtained within it. All the Continental inventions for facilitating the business of the stage will be adopted, and every improvement that can be suggested in the system of lighting, ventilating, and warming the interior.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

MR. GLAISHER'S NINTH SCIENTIFIC BALLOON ASCENT took place on the 21st ult., in Mr. Coxwell's great balloon, at the Crystal Palace. The results of his previous ascents in July, August, and September last, having shown the inaccuracies of the theory of the law of a uniform rate of decrease of 1 deg. of Fahrenheit scale of temperature for every increase of 300 ft. in height, the British Association, in October, voted £200 to be expended in further experiments, to begin in the spring, and, if possible, during an easterly wind. Accordingly, on the above-mentioned day, "the balloon," says Mr. Glaisher, in his letter to the Times, "left the earth at 2h. 20m. 16s. p.m., the temperature of the air being 58 deg. At 2h. 30m. we were one mile high, with a temperature of 50 deg.; at the second mile, 42 deg.; at 3h. 30m., with a temperature of 26 deg.; the third mile at 4h. 44m., when the temperature was 14 deg.; and at 5 miles high the temperature was 5 deg. below zero. At 6 miles high, at 5h. 30m., and the temperature rose to 12 deg. at 6h. 18m.; at 7h. 12m. we passed out of the cloud, 7 miles high, where the temperature was 10 deg. below zero of Fahrenheit's scale. In descending, the temperature increased to 11 deg. at about 5 miles high, the highest point at which we again met with frost, it decreased to 7 deg. We soon passed through it, and the temperature increased to 19 deg. at 3 miles high, to 30 deg. at 2 miles high, and to 40 deg. on the ground, which was reached at 6h. 30m. The air was dry before leaving the earth; it became very moist at the height of 2 miles, and remained so, increasing 4 miles the temperature of the dew point was fully minus 6 deg."

THE ROYAL INSTITUTION, of a series of popular lectures, discovered by M. Lennier, of Havre, were described by M. Valenciennes at a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. An interesting circumstance in this tortoise is its possessing nine ribs, all three hitherto known having but eight. M. Valenciennes therefore instituted a new family for Nouvelonia. Descriptive details are given in the Comptes Rendus of the Academy.

THEORY OF THE PRODUCTION OF STEEL.—M. Charles Sainte Claire Deville, the secretary of the French Academy of Sciences, commenting on the researches of M. Caron, says that the latter confirms the important remark due to Mr. Mushet, namely, that the steel which is produced we obtain as a residuum a graphitous matter, which does not appear in the case of iron and steel. M. Caron, on the other hand, by his own experiments of M. Regnault, which establish that non-compacted steel possesses a density considerably greater than that of iron, has shown that this circumstance is in perfect concordance with the theory. The steel, therefore, is produced by the combination, which had for their object the removal of the peculiar physical and chemical properties which may characterise the iron. Then, according to the chemical proportion of latent heat which results from them, Anosoff's process consists in adding that definite, and no more, which appears to form two clearly distinct categories, namely, the compounds, alloys and the experiments of M. Jacquelain, in accordance with those of Lavoisier and Hillman, authorise the following conclusions:—1. Steel and iron do not absorb hydrogen, nitrogen, or carbonic acid for the same period. 2. Although in the amount absorbed under the conditions of the experiment the considerability of the gases be present, this is not the only quality regulating the absorption of steel. 3. Steel and iron, when they absorb gases, retain them with great force, which varies with the nature of the gas, being greatest in the case of water, and slowly even at lower temperatures. 4. Charcoals differ entirely in their behaviour with gases in the capacity of saturation with oxygen, animal charcoal possessing the latter property in a greater degree than wood charcoal. 5. Mixtures of charcoal with sulphur, and by charcoal, diffuse into the atmosphere of another gas with such force as to depress the mercury three-quarters of an inch. 6. Water expels mercury from the gases of the laboratory in an instantaneous action. 9. The action of porous bodies is not indiscriminate, but elective. Dr. De Luca, of Naples, in a communication to the Academy, says "The elective nature of porous bodies may be closely allied to three properties—the condensation of the gases, the Attraction and perhaps tendency to combine, and the capacity of combination. Chemical affinity is supposed to involve an attraction between two bodies, and the proof of such an attraction as a separate power; we have only a proof of the combination. Attraction may exist without any tendency to combine chemically or without, in other terms, chemical affinity, which is only known by combination. The previous attraction has never yet been known of two kinds; and it seems more in accordance with Nature to diminish than increase the number of original powers."

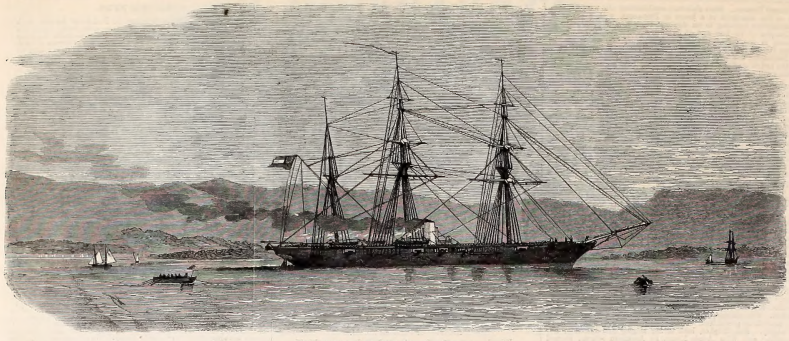
THE HONEY-BEE.—In the Annals of Natural History for April we have the translation of part of a paper on "The Geographical Distribution and Varieties of the Honey-Bee," by Dr. A. Gerstäcker, of which we give a few points:—Latreille, Brue, and other writers considered that our common bee, or domestic honey-bee, is indigenous to the countries to the north of Europe. An opposite opinion is also very generally held. The latest writer on the subject, Dr. Dzierzon, is of opinion that the bee is not indigenous in the hot countries of the Old World, where as almost perpetually serene sky enables it to work industriously during the whole year. In the very early period, human civilisation carried it into northern localities, where it is compelled to remain for the greater part of the year in a state of inactivity. It has no winter sleep like other animals; it needs nourishment to the country. Dr. Gerstäcker, however, rather considers that the bee is indigenous to the countries of the middle temperate zone. We must refer our spurious friends to his remarks for a very valuable account of the bee's habits. The matters showing the intimate connection of the bee with the ancient mythology, especially with that of the Greeks, who put a large value upon it, and with the Egyptians, who, as far as we either altogether omitted from the animal worship of Egypt, or at least played a very subordinate part in it. It is generally known that the bee was introduced from Egypt into Greece. Dr. Gerstäcker considers that this supposition can neither be confirmed nor refuted; but, from the great independently of the high antiquity of the bee in Greece, the difference between the Egyptian bee and that of Greece is so small that one could not be observed from the other. It appears probable that the culture of the bee in Italy was introduced from Greece, and not immediately from Egypt. Dr. Gerstäcker gives also many interesting particulars respecting the distribution and habits of the bee in East Africa, &c., collected from the writings of travellers and modern travellers.

THE WELWITSCHIA, a singular plant, is the subject of an illustrated memoir by Dr. Joseph Hooker, which has appeared in the new part of the Transactions of the Linnæan Society. The first notice of Welwitschia was given by Dr. Welwitsch, a botanical traveller in Africa, in a letter written from Londa, in South Africa, dated Aug. 16, 1860, which was soon followed by the publication of a notice in the Gardeners' Chronicle. It consists of masses more than the same two leaves, although it seems to be very long-lived. These leaves appear to be perennial, withering only at the tips as they extend, and giving place to ordinary leaves, are permanent, and attain to a length of 6 ft. and upwards, and a breadth of 1 ft. and upwards. They grow from a groove situated at the base of the stem, and are long-lasting. They appear to be confined to the coast region of Benguela, and to the Portuguese province of Mossamedes. In this period, has other vegetative organs that those proper to the embryo itself: the stem is a long tapering cone, covered by the rudicle, which remains undivided, and develops a root from its base, and inflorescences from its plumary end, and the leaves from its sides. Dr. Hooker has given a botanical and specialised condition." The venation of the leaves is "parallel and free; the that of parasitic tapering monocotyledons; but there is a remarkable bilateral venetic communications between the bundles," as to many conifers.

THE DISCOVERY OF ALLOTROPIC PHOSPHORUS is generally attributed to M. Schrötter, of Vienna, in October 1845. We learn from M. Nickles, in the new recitalin periodical Les Mondes, that M. Kopp stated, in 1844, in the Comptes Rendus of the Academy of Sciences, that, in preparing the hydrated ether of iodine—by means of alcohol, phosphorus, and iodine—he had encountered an insoluble matter in the form of a red powder. When well washed this substance was insipid, inodorous, and readily acted on by the oxygen of the atmosphere. M. Kopp thought that this phosphorus which could be dried in the sand-bath without sensibly oxydising, but to wax cloth difficulty from the ordinary phosphorus. When ordinary phosphorus is heated in the absence of air, it undergoes a change which M. Schrötter has termed isolation; it was transformed into ordinary phosphorus.' In 1845 Berzelius confirmed M. Kopp's experiments. This was the discovery of amorphous phosphorus of Schrötter; but M. Kopp did not then see that this form of phosphorus was the same as that which Schrötter had obtained. The allotropic condition of phosphorus is no longer determinate temperature, and that, when so obtained, it is not poisonous, and may be employed with perfect safety in the manufacture of the lucifer matches.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.—On Thursday next, the 16th inst., Professor Ansted will commence a course of nine lectures "On the Relations of Geology with Allied Sciences." Professor Marshall will resume his lectures on "Animal Mechanics," on Tuesday; and Professor Max Müller his lectures on "The Science of Language" on Saturday. The Friday evening discourse will be given by Mr. Frank Buckland, "On the Culture of Fish."

MEAN DENSITY OF THE EARTH.—In a memoir on this subject by M. Pope, read at a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, the following valuations, from pendulum experiments, are given:—1 by Carlini and Plana, 5·77; by Giulio, 5·44; by Kater, 5·66; by Hutton, and Playfair, at Schehallien, in Scotland; H. James, at the same place; 5·44 by Reich, 5·48; by Baily, at Arthur's Seat, and by Baily, by means of the torsion balance; and 5·66 by Airy, at the summit and bottom of a coal mine.



THE ALABAMA AT PORT ROYAL, JAMAICA.

THE ALABAMA AT PORT ROYAL, JAMAICA.

OUR Engraving represents the Alabama as she put into Port Royal, Jamaica, for repairs after her sharp and decisive engagement with the United States' gun-boat Hatteras. Our Correspondent, a young officer of her Majesty's ship Challenger, to whom we are indebted for the sketch from which our Engraving is taken, has also forwarded us a spirited account of the engagement as narrated to him by one of Captain Semmes' officers. "The Alabama," writes our Correspondent, "was trying to break the blockade off Fort Galveston, and came suddenly upon the Yankee fleet at anchor. She immediately put about, but not before she was espied and a large gun-boat was after her; but, being a good sailer, she kept her position without any material distance being gained or lost on either side. However, when Captain Semmes thought he was sufficiently clear of the Yankee fleet, he determined to shorten sail and fight his pursuer. So, 'easing his sheets a little,' to use their own words, up comes this gun-boat, only a vessel of 1200 tons, with eleven guns, with a hail, 'Ship ahoy! What's your name, and where bound?' Of course, the Alabama was all ready prepared, and Captain Semmes answered the hail with 'Alabama, and bound to the ——!' and a broadside. The action lasted seventeen minutes, at the expiration of which time the captain of the Yankee vessel, the Hatteras—for that was her name—hailed for quarter, saying that she was sinking, and that he wanted assistance. They saved 101 men and 17 officers; but there is every reason to believe that some must have perished, but how many Captain Semmes never could find out, as a strict silence was kept by the Federals on the subject. The Alabama came in here under French colours; but at eight next morning she displayed the Secessionist flag. She came in on the evening of the 20th of January, and started again on the 30th of same month, after having coaled, revictualled, and repaired damages. She was struck in five places; three may be seen in the Sketch I send you. They present a jagged appearance. One little incident speaks greatly against the efficiency of the Yankee shells, one of which was found in the Alabama's stokehole, after the action, with the fuse burnt down; but instead of there being powder in the shell it was full of black sand. The action was fought at seventy yards' distance, the Alabama being under sail, while the Yankee was under steam. They landed all their prisoners on the afternoon of the 22nd."

LAUNCH OF THE OCEAN.

THE armour-plated screw-frigate Ocean was safely launched on the 19th ult., at Devonport, by her builder, Mr. Peake, in the presence of a large concourse of persons, including the Admiral-Superintendent, Admiral Tucker, Major-General Hutchinson, and Colonel Owen, C.E. She was named by Mrs. Symonds, wife of Admiral T. M. C. Symonds, C.B., Superintendent of the Dockyard.

The Ocean was originally designed as a 100-gun ship. However, by the time her frame was nearly up the Admiralty had arrived at the conclusion that as such she would be useless; and therefore sent orders for her conversion to a 35-gun armour-plated frigate. The first duty of Mr. J. P. Peake, the Master Shipwright, on receiving these instructions, was to lengthen the ship 27 ft. The Ocean was then cut in two amidships, the fore section was hauled up 20 ft., and five pairs of frames were inserted. The original framework of the stem and stern was taken down, and both were made sharper. The Ocean is classed with the Prince Consort, Caledonia, Royal Alfred, and Royal Oak, all of 6045 tons burden. The three first named will have engines of 1000-horse power; in the other two engines of 800-horse power will be fitted. She is of quite a different construction from the Warrior class, being a two bowed ship. Her stern, in fact, is as sharp as her bow, which bevels off to an edge. All her ports are embrasured, which affords a much greater protection to the gunners. The ports will also be strengthened with an additional thickness of iron plating. She is to be plated with six rows of plates—one row above the maindeck ports, 3 ft. wide; one row between the ports, 3ft. 10in. wide; and four rows under the ports, 3 ft. 1 in. wide. The lower edge of armour-plates will extend to 5 ft. 4 in. below her load water-line. The number of plates will be 275, of which 168 will be of a parallel thickness—viz., 4½ inches, and will be fixed on the midship part of her; and the remaining 112 will be fixed at the bows and stern, and will taper from 4½ to 3 inches in a distance of 40 feet from bow and stern, except in the less exposed parts—viz., under the buttocks, where it will be reduced to 1½ inch thick. The total weight of the plates is nearly 935 tons. Her upper deck beams are of iron, on which are placed a ¾ iron plate, and then an oak deck on the top. She has also an iron rudderhead. She has no knee or figurehead, but will be fitted with carved work both on bows and stern. The following are her principal dimensions:—

	Ft.	In.
Length between the perpendiculars	278	0
Length of the keel for tonnage	232	8½
Breadth extreme	58	0
Breadth for tonnage	57	2
Breadth moulded	56	4
Depth in hold	19	10
Draught of water when ready for sea,—forward ..	24	7
Ditto .. .. .. aft ..	26	9

The number and power of her guns will be as follow:—On her main deck she will carry twenty-four 68-pounders, 95 cwt.; and eight 110-pounders, 82 cwt., Armstrong. On her upper deck, three 110-pounders, 82 cwt., Armstrong.

The Ocean will be barque rigged. Her lower masts and bowsprit are being made of iron at Chegstow. The mainmast will be 83 feet long, 37 inches diameter, and will weigh about 20 tons; foremast, length, 77 feet 6 inches, diameter, 36 inches; mizenmast, 67 feet 8 inches, diameter, 24 inches; bowsprit, 20 feet outboard, diameter, 36 inches.

Her engines are being made by Messrs. Maudslay Sons and Field, of Lambeth, and are collectively of 1000-horse power (nominal); the cylinders are 92 inch diameter, with a 4-feet stroke of piston.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1199.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1863. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE CZAR'S PROCLAMATION OF PARDON.

Is it owing to a clearer apprehension of the difficult work cut out for his Government by the Polish insurgents, to a desire of forestalling the pressure of Western diplomacy, or to a personal leaning to clemency, that Alexander II. of Russia has seen fit to publish a manifesto offering an amnesty to "all Poles in the kingdom who shall lay down their arms and return to their allegiance by the 13th of May," and declaring his Imperial intention "to open a new epoch of political life, based upon the rational organisation of administrative local self-government?" Perhaps the fact is due in part to each of the above causes; but, whatever may have conduced to it, the fact itself is one of primary significance.

It may be reasonably doubted whether the amnesty, the publication of which signalised the Russian Easter Sunday, will exercise any conciliatory influence upon the hostile relations of the parties now engaged in strife. Documents of this kind seldom weigh much with men who have taken up arms in vindication of their national rights—unless, indeed, they are addressed to a people who have consciously lost their last chance of success. The Poles have not yet been so decidedly worsted and demoralised, in their ostensibly unequal struggle with Russia, as to put them under any very strong temptation to commit themselves once more to the tender mercies of a Government, which could discern no moral objection to resort to a process of kidnapping for the purpose of consigning the whole liberal political manhood of Poland to a living tomb. The recollections which crowd the last thirty years are not such as will plead eloquently with the Poles for their acceptance of proffered pardon. The mere proposal to blot out the present, that the future may be as the past, is not at all likely to stir, in the hearts of the insurgents, intense yearnings, nor to kindle brilliant hopes. This generation—the people now in actual rebellion against foreign domination—never once tasted Russian clemency, know not what it is, and therefore cannot have any fond thoughts of it, as an asylum to which it would be desirable to return. The ruler never thought of so using his undisputed power as to gain the sympathy of the ruled. Poland has not, within the memory of the living, been suffered to see Russia in any light but that of a spoiler devoid of every trace of humanity. She can hardly be expected, therefore, to cast herself at her tyrant's feet at the first vague promise of forgiveness.

Nor does the foreshadowing in this manifesto of "administrative local self-government" assume either a definite or an attractive form. "We have already laid the foundations of this in the institutions which have been granted"—so the telegram summarises the text of the document—"the efficacy of which has not yet been put to the test. It is our desire to maintain those institutions, while reserving to ourselves the right of proceeding with their future development, according to the requirement of the age and of the country." Words like these, in the mouth of Russia, can hardly be characterised as delusive, for they will deceive nobody. The most elocidatory comment upon them will be found in the course pursued by the Imperial Government towards Poland from 1830 down to the present moment. Paper Constitutions, the efficacy of which has never yet been tested, and which are to be developed according to what may be an autocrat's notion of the requirements of the age and country, can hardly be considered a bait at which a people in full revolution will be eager to rise. Their utter uselessness has been too well attested by experience to warrant their being readily or highly appreciated in the dim prospect. Not a syllable can be discovered in this announcement calculated to bind the Czar to anything beyond his own good pleasure. The exceptions to his amnesty are so drawn as to place every Pole to escape it at the bare mercy of the offended Government, and the promise of administrative local self-government is so light in substance and so nebulous in form that it may easily be dissipated by the first serious attempt to reduce it to a fact. The expatriation of Count Zamoyski, the military slaughter of unarmed crowds in the streets of prayer and praise in the churches at Warsaw; the midnight execution of a conscription, justly stigmatised by civilised Europe as a proscription: the appointment of General Berg to supreme authority; and the uncontrolled barbarity of the Russian soldiery in Poland, have raised a tempest to be reversed by one of which will probably prevent any such indistinct utterances of mercy as those of the Imperial manifesto, from making the smallest impression upon those to whom they are addressed.

But, while the amnesty is likely to have a small influence upon the future of this terrible struggle, it throws a flood of light upon the present position of it. It is a revelation which turns into certainties a number of suspicions. The insurrection that was to have been stamped out "in ten days" by order of the Emperor, but which is now acknowledged against itself within thirty days, cannot be so trifling an affair as the official pen has so frequently described it. From the fact that the manifesto is addressed, not only to all Poles in the kingdom, but also to those of the western provinces, it is clear that the conflagration spreads in a alarming manner. Lithuania, Podolia, and the Ukraine appear to be in as disturbed a state as any part of the Duchy of Warsaw. Ninety thousand men have hitherto been able to do but little towards the pacification of a wide extent of country swarming with guerrilla bands which can almost every where find shelter in woods and wood. The autocrat of all the Russias is powerful, but even he cannot do as he will with impunity. That the Polish insurrection is telling upon his fears we may gather proof from this proclamation; that it is formidable enough to justify those fears, evidence is pouring in from various quarters.

We can hardly think, however, that the astute counsellors who surround the Emperor cherish the faintest hope that an insurrection which gains head in spite of fire and sword will succumb to the grant of an amnesty. Indeed, they may have deemed it worth while to try the chance of severing all connection between the combatant and non-combatant portion of the Polish population. But is it not far more consistent with our knowledge of Russian statecraft to regard this ostentation of clemency as mainly intended to affect the protest of the Western Powers? An amnesty is probably what the Czar was well aware would be pressed upon him by Austria, France, and England; administrative local self-government would be the extent of the change recommended by the three combined Powers. The proclamation is an answer beforehand to diplomatic interference—cleverly takes the wind out of its sails—shuts it up, as it were, to future silence and inaction. The less ground there was for supposing that the Poles would avail themselves of this offer of mercy, the more reason there was for parading it before the eyes of Western Europe. "See," exclaims the Czar, "it is not my will to prolong this lamentable contest. I am ready to do all that a Sovereign may do, without a surrender of his honour to anxious to give effect to the engagements made by Russia in the Treaty of Vienna." We know not how the protesting Governments can meet this bland profession. It cuts from under them all ground for international complaint. It baffles their interference by a nominal withdrawal of the causes of it. It is a clever countermove by which the diplomacy of St. Petersburg seeks to checkmate that of St. James's and the Tuileries. We will not go the length of affirming—for, of course, we are not in a position to prove—that it never had any other object; but we fear that, in all human probability, it will have no other result.

A diplomatic victory, however, may be too dearly purchased. Neither France nor England, nor even Austria, will be at a loss to comprehend the real character of this move; nor is it the least likely to impose upon the insurgent Poles. Russia has yet to learn that governments gain no permanent strength from the triumphs of chicane, however perfectly it may answer its immediate purpose. To be technically right, but morally wrong, will satisfy no instincts but those of semi-civilisation. Possibly, the result of these over-ingenious tactics may not answer the expectation with which they seem to have been resorted to. Governments never relish being outwitted. If the impression produced upon the English and French Cabinets by the Czar's manifesto should be that it was designed rather to baffle the remonstrant Powers than to pacify the people of Poland, the Emperor's position will be not a little weakened thereby. Half his chances consist in the reverence entertained for his Imperial pretensions by more enlightened Potentates. That reverence once broken down, he runs the danger of being roughly called to account. Europe has a strong and strong interest in putting an end to the pleasure the encroachments of Tartar barbarity upon her settled civilisation. Her forbearance has been great. Her respect for the Empire has had in it a dash of superstition. But if once she gets into her head the suspicion that she is being hoodwinked as well as gravely inconvenienced, it will not be long before the Emperor will be compelled to swallow the bitter fruits of the diplomatic legerdemain of his statesmen, and Russians perhaps may have even greater calamities to deplore than the restoration of the ancient kingdom of Poland.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Queen Victoria has forwarded, through Lord Cowley, a letter of thanks to the Emperor for the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour sent to the Prince of Wales.

It is asserted that the Prince and Princess of Wales will visit the Emperor at the Palace of Fontainebleau about the middle of May.

The races at the Bois de Boulogne were largely attended by the presence of the Emperor and Empress. The course was crowded by an immense number of smart equipages and thousands of pedestrians.

A State banquet was given at the British Embassy, Paris, on Wednesday week, by Lord and Lady Cowley, in honour of the marriage of the Prince of Wales. All the chief members of the Corps Diplomatique, the Ministers of the Emperor, and other high functionaries, were present, to the number of sixty or seventy persons. In the evening the hotel of the Embassy was brilliantly illuminated, and an evening reception took place, to which invitations were issued to about 1500 persons, including amongst them many English residents, the clergy, professional men, and others.

An Imperial decree has been published, prorogating the Corps Législatif to the 30th of April.

On Sunday last the Archbishop of Paris took the usual oaths, between the hands of the Emperor, in the chapel of the Tuileries, in the presence of the Ministers of State and Public Worship.

On Thursday week was celebrated, at the British Embassy at Paris, the marriage of Captain Robert Maurice Robertson, of the 60th Rifles, with Lady Augusta Bruce, daughter of the Earl of Dartmouth.

Amongst a large influx of foreign visitors at present in Paris are Signor Rattazzi and his wife, married wife, the Duchess of Sutherland. The lady, it will be remembered, is a Bonaparte, of the Lucien branch.

Count Walewski, returning Equerry to the Emperor, has just died at the palace of St. Cloud.

A new illustrated weekly paper, Le Moniteur Illustré, is about to be started. It will be published on the 1st and 15th of every month. The standard for this new series of coin will be 835 thousandths of pure silver. This is rather inferior to the old standard, but has been adopted in order to bring the coin of France into harmony with that of Belgium, Germany, and Swiss, who collect is and sell it abroad at a premium. The value of the new coin is fixed at 5f. 25c.

A short note written and signed by Martin Luther, and bearing the date of 1537, was sold last Saturday in Paris for 500f.

Workmen are actively engaged in repairing two large rooms at the Louvre, on the side towards the colonnade, formerly occupied by the Spanish Museum. To receive the paintings of the Chronological Collection. Workmen have likewise been employed for some days in taking soundings of the floor of the basements of the long gallery of the Louvre, to serve as models in the outside decorations of the new buildings of the Tuileries.

The French Minister of War has authorised several French officers to proceed to Madagascar to give instruction to the troops of King Radama II.

The Gazette de France announces that the pupils of the School of St. Cyr have opened a subscription in favour of Poland. Seventeen are leaving Paris for Poland almost daily, to take part in the insurrection. Among these are French as well as Poles, and it appears that they are all well supplied with money.

SPAIN.

The new Premier, the Marquis de Miraflores, has made his Ministerial declaration before a political faith in the Cortes. The Administration will, he said, be "Liberal-Conservative" and "Constitutional." It will respect the rights of the Crown and the existing constitutional reforms." In foreign affairs it will preserve neutrality, but will maintain the dignity of Spain.

PORTUGAL.

The Chambers have been prorogued till the 20th of May.

It is reported in Lisbon that Prince Auguste is to be married to one of the Princesses of Italy.

ITALY.

King Victor Emmanuel has commenced a tour in his provinces. On Thursday week his Majesty arrived at Florence, accompanied by three of the Ministers, and was received with the greatest enthusiasm, the town having decorated for his occasion.

A circular has been issued by the Minister of Justice, calling upon the public prosecutor to "keep a vigilant watch upon the subversive tendencies of the Federalist and Radical press."

The Chamber of Deputies is occupied with the debate on the Budget of the Minister of the Interior.

TURKEY.

The Sultan reached Cairo on Wednesday week. Besides visiting the Pyramids, he has paid a high mark of respect to the Viceroy of Egypt by offering up prayers at the sepulchre of his great predecessor, Mehemet Ali, during a visit to the tomb of Said Pasha. The Sultan has also given a proof of his liberal ideas by conferring on the chiefs of the Jewish, Greek, Catholic, and other religions the rank of high officer of one of the Turkish orders, his Majesty observing on the occasion that he made no distinction upon the score of religious belief.

Fuad Pacha has proposed the creation of an Ottoman militia, or national guard, which, under the command of the Sultan's subjects, of whatever religion, shall be liable to serve, and the idea has so far commended itself to his Majesty that he irade sanctioning the force has issued, and a commission will shortly be named to agree upon the organisation and superintend the embodiment of the new landwehr.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the Inman steamer Etna we have accounts from New York to the morning of the 6th inst.

WAR NEWS.

The Federal accounts of the partially successful attempt of Commodore Farragut to pass the Fort Hudson batteries have at length seen the light. The Hartford, the flagship, accompanied by the Albatross, advanced to the attack, followed by five other steamers. The Fort Hudson batteries opened upon them, and an engagement ensued, which lasted from ten o'clock at night until daybreak on the following Sunday. The Hartford and the Albatross passed safely. All the other vessels were driven back, except the steamer Mississippi, which grounded immediately opposite Port Hudson, and was blown up by order of her commander. Sixty of her crew were killed or missing. Upon the other vessels ten men, including Commander Cumming, were killed and thirty wounded. Confederate accounts state that only two men in the Port Hudson batteries were wounded. Fears are entertained by the Federals lest their two isolated vessels fall a victim to the three steam-rams in the possession of the Confederates.

The camp opposite Vicksburg is abandoned, the Confederate cannon commanding the whole of its length.

General Sherman's expedition to the rear of Haines' Bluff, by way of Smallwood Landing, has resulted in Yazoo City and Yazoo River in accomplishing its object. The obstructions placed in the river, and sharpshooters along the shore, rendered an advance impossible.

The Federal General Gilmore reports that he encountered a body of 2000 Confederate Cavalry between Kentucky and Green rivers in confusion across the Cumberland River. He took 400 prisoners. His own loss only amounted to thirty.

The Confederate General Forrest reports that he visited Brentwood, in Tennessee, burnt the bridge, took all the property and arms, and captured 600 prisoners, including 30 officers. Brentwood is nine miles from Nashville and Franklin.

The correspondence of the New York Evening Post states that the Federal soldiers on the occupation of Pensacola burned the town when ordered to evacuate it by Colonel Dyer, their commanding officer. Both men and officers are represented to have been in a state of great demoralisation. Colonel Dyer in vain attempted to stop the work of destruction.

The privateer Florida has captured and burnt the ship Star of Peace, from Calcutta, for Liverpool. The Florida has also captured another American schooner. She was chased by the Vanderbilt, off Barbadoes, but escaped.

THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

President Davis is reported to be suffering from an abscess in the eye, by which it is feared he will lose his sight. He lost the sight of one eye some years ago.

The people of the Confederate States are suffering from want of food, while yellow fever has broken out in the extreme south of Louisiana. It is feared that it will appear in New Orleans, which has been free from it since 1858.

The Charleston Courier reports the arrival and departure of a number of steamers and sailing vessels, notwithstanding the blockade. Charleston is enjoying a larger direct foreign trade than she ever had before.

WASHINGTON.

President Lincoln has appointed the 30th inst. as a day of fasting, prayer, and humiliation.

The captain of the captured steamer Petershoff has laid the facts attending her capture before Lord Lyons, who, it is reported, will make a formal demand for the immediate restoration by the vessel and indemnity to the owners.

The Legislature of Kansas has carved a new territory out of Oregon, Dacotah, and Washington, to be called Idaho. It embraces 4 degree of latitude and 11 degrees of longitude. It is very rich in mineral wealth. A very few years ago no white man existed within the territory. It now contains a numerous mining population.

THE NORTH-EASTERN STATES.

The New York Legislature has passed a bill providing that only foreign creditors should receive interest on the State debt in coin; others will be paid in paper.

The State election of Rhode Island has resulted in the success of the whole Republican ticket.

General Butler was received by the "Loyal League" at the New York Academy of Music, on the 2nd inst. The address was delivered by the Mayor. Judge Daly, in his speech, enjoyed advocated the extermination of the "rebels," the confiscation of the estates of the planters and the liberation of the negroes as soldiers of the U.S. It was particularly bitter against British Government and aristocracy, and the degradation of England and the Florida, in consequence. It remarked that non-intercourse with England be proclaimed, so that not an ounce of food should be exported to her ports. It was now getting into a condition to remember that case. He advised retaliation for the depredations of the Alabama and the Florida, in proclaiming

The Moniteur of Monday, in its bulletin, says:—"The Austrian Government having displayed views upon the Polish question in contrariety with those of the Western powers, an understanding has been established between the three Courts for acting in concert towards the Cabinet of St. Petersburg."

The Paris papers speak variously respecting the manifesto of the Czar. La France and the Nation find in it the commencement of the satisfaction decided to the wishes of the Powers. The Patrie says:—"The diplomatic action of the Powers is engaged, and will be carried out without being arrested by the false calculations which a fatal delirium rose seeks to throw in its way." The Siècle does not think that the manifesto will satisfy either Poland or the Powers. The Pays has not an article to the same effect. The Opinion Nationale, in an article signed by M. Guéroult, says:—"France will never allow herself to be misled respecting the value of the Russian answer."

The Government of Prussia has issued a rescript, according to which the military reforms so Prussian and are to be sent back to Poland, or, where that is not practicable, they are to be arrested and imprisoned in Prussia.

Rumours assert that the Swedes are positively demanding action of a definite kind on behalf of Poland. A Stockholm journal accuses the Ministry for inclusiveness in the affairs of Poland, and calls for an energetic action in the interest of Sweden herself. Russia is believed to be particularly indignant at the attitude of the Swedish people. Indeed, it is said that the Russian Ambassador at Stockholm has peremptorily demanded explanations from the Swedish Government, and threatens in the case of not receiving a satisfactory reply to demand his passports.

Langlewicz has declared to the authorities that he can no longer be bound by his parole. It is expected that he will, therefore, be placed under a stricter guard.

AUSTRALIA.

MELBOURNE, Feb. 24.

THE past has been rather an exciting month in our colonial world, but outside the colony our doings are comparatively unimportant, save and except the tension in our political conduct (or, as it is also called, want of consistency) as we shall calculated to teach. Mr. Duffy, the Minister of Lands and Survey, has been attacked by one of the Democratic newspapers for his breach of faith in the administration of his department. It was stated that, to favour a well-known squatter, named Hugh Glass, Mr. Duffy caused alterations to be made in the survey maps of a valuable part of the country, by which malpractice Mr. Glass obtained the possession of a mile and a half on the banks of the River Loddon, without a single reserve for the benefit of the public. The matter was brought before the Assembly in the form of a motion, by which Mr. Duffy gave what appeared to be satisfactory replies, in which his own conduct, as well as that of Mr. Glass, in the transaction, was entirely exculpated.

In deference to the views of the Duke of Newcastle, the Governor's Salary was reduced from the handsome annual sum of £5,000 to £4,000 per annum, which, in the second time, the salaries of future governors of the colony have been fixed at £4,000 a year—the same amount as the others. Sir Henry Barkly has guaranteed the amount now paid him (£15,000) so long as he is continued here.

The Australian cricket-match, between Victoria and New South Wales this year played in Sydney, which was by 81 runs, under circumstances, however, not creditable to our cricketers or to key generally. It is stated that during the second day's play, when the tide of fortune seemed to have turned in favour of Victoria, a disgraceful scene took place the men rushed on the ground and ill-treated the Victorian Eleven, the consequence of which was that two of their best men (one of them being the captain) were disabled, and immediately took steamer for Melbourne. The remaining nine played out the match, but of course lost it.

Our volunteers have again been under canvas—this year on the banks of the Barwon, near Geelong. Their conduct was highly creditable to the colonists, and showed the marked improvement which is taking place in their discipline. There have been no deaths in the camp, but a few cases, which have done a great deal of change.

In Queensland, which suffered so much from dry weather during the summer, there have been extensive floods, cutting off communication between the different towns in the interior.

METROPOLITAN NEWS

The sum of £125 has been forwarded to the Lord Mayor by her Majesty and the Prince of Wales for the relief of those who had suffered by the calamitous conflagration of the Illustrations.

Mr. Mark Lemon has consented to give a dramatic reading in aid of the funds of the Printers' Almshouses, in the hall of the Whittington Club, on Saturday, May 2.

The great rifle-shooting race for the championship of the Thames took place on Tuesday between Robert Chambers, of Newcastle, the champion of last year, and George Grevenor, of Greenwich. Chambers won easily.

On Thursday evening Cardinal Wiseman officially announced this year's consecrated a new Roman Catholic church in Hatton-wall. The church, which is a handsome and substantial structure, is dedicated to St. Peter.

Easter Term commenced on Wednesday. In consequence of a recent bereavement, the Lord Chancellor did not give his customary breakfast, and the Courts proceeded to business early in the morning.

The second exhibition of spring plants and flowers this season in the grounds of the Botanic Society, Regent's Park, was held on Saturday last. The chief feature of the show consisted of azaleas, of which there were many fine and well-grown plants. There was a numerous attendance.

The thirty-fifth anniversary festival of the Merchant Seamen's Orphan Asylum was celebrated on Wednesday at the London Tavern; the chair was occupied by Admiral Lushington, Esq., and his genial presidency was attended by many old and zealous supporters of the charity. A number of ladies took part in the proceedings in the convenient gallery at the back.

At a numerous meeting of the Royal Thames Yacht Club on Wednesday, presided over by Lord Wilton, Lord Alfred Paget was unanimously re-elected commodore amidst great applause. The office of vice-commodore, vacant by the death of Richard Gilpin, was filled by a large majority, by Sir Gilbert East; and the office of treasurer to Mr. S. Cleve.

Sir George Grey has given notice that he intends, on Tuesday next, to move a motion to bring in a bill for the amalgamation of the City of London police with the metropolitan police. Ward meetings have been held in various parts of the city to protest against the proposed measure, and in every case resolutions were passed in accordance with the object of the meeting, and which were to be presented to Parliament by the representatives of the Independence of the city.

Lord Palmerston, M.P., presided on Tuesday evening at a meeting in the Vestry Hall, Marylebone, called to express sympathy with Poland. Mr. Harvey Lewis, Mr. C. Robert Gilbert, M.P., and Mr. Thomas Chambers, M.P., were present. The first resolution, which charged the Russians with a systematic violation of the rights of Poland, and urged that proper representation of the matter Poland to her place in the family of nations in Europe, was carried; as were resolutions expressing sympathy with the Poles and Swedes.

The third of the spring flower shows announced this year by the council of the Royal Horticultural Society took place on Wednesday in their gardens, South Kensington. The seasons were resplendent by every variety of colour, and the show was one of the most successful of the horticultural and some pretty and delicate ferns. Among the more distinguished visitors were the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary of Cambridge.

From papers officially published on Wednesday, it appears that Professor Airy, the Astronomer Royal, and Admiral Washington, of the Admiralty, acted as the umpires in the line of railway that now runs from Greenwich Park. There are two lines contemplated, which pass within a few hundred feet of the Royal Observatory, and, consequently, the question of transporting within a the vessel fast of the Observatory would disturb the operations. They therefore recommend that both the lines should be rejected.

Last week the births of 2180 children—1131 boys and 1049 girls—were registered in London. In the corresponding week of the years 1853-62 the average number (corrected) was 1977.—The mortality of London continues to be unusually high for the season. In the week ending with last Saturday the deaths recorded were 1610, in the weeks of ten years 1853-62, corresponding with the same week, the average was 1110, showing a constantly increasing population, was 1576. The deaths of ten nonagenarians were returned in the week; the greatest age was 96 years, at which ten deaths occurred.

The London Orphan Asylum, Clapton, held its jubilee commemoration festival on Wednesday, at Merchant Taylors' Hall. During the half-century which the charity has been the means of affording gratuitous education, and clothing to nearly 3000 fatherless children; and the managers have resolved to commemorate the jubilee by electing 100 orphans within the ensuing twelve months to the benefits of the institution. This large addition to the charity of the institution will entail an expenditure of £6000, independently of the cost of the adaptation of the building for the reception of the increased number of inmates, which is estimated to cost between £5000 and £6000. The charity has already disbursed about £262,276, and there are at this moment 437 orphans under the benefits of it. The report for the present year records the gratifying fact that the efforts of the institution are cordially recognised and appreciated, and that the old subscribers continue to afford keeping and subscriptions, in fully equal proportion to those received in past years. The company numbered over 200—his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge presiding. The subscriptions announced amounted to £970.

THE COURT.

The Queen continues in good health. Her Majesty drove out in a carriage-and-four on Saturday last, accompanied by Princesses Helena and Beatrice, attended by the Duchess of Athole, and Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge on horseback.

On Sunday the Queen, Prince Alfred, Princess Helena, Princess Louise, Prince Leopold, and Prince Louis of Hesse, with the ladies and gentleman in waiting, attended Divine service in the private chapel. The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louise, walked and drove in the grounds of Windsor Park.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, walked and drove in the grounds. This was the anniversary of the date of the accession of Queen Victoria. Major-General Bouverie also arrived at the castle from the Ranger's Lodge, Greenwich Park, and returned to the same residence.

On Wednesday the Queen, accompanied by the Princess Helena, drove out in a carriage-and-four. The Prince of Wales, Prince Leopold and Princess Beatrice went to London and visited the Zoological Society's Gardens.

On Thursday Lord Ely has succeeded the Duchess of Athole as Lady in Waiting to the Queen. Lord Cremorne and Captain Sir W. Hall have succeeded Lord Talbot and Lieutenant-General Kingscote as Lord and Groom in Waiting. Major-General Seymour has succeeded Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey as Equerry in Waiting.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales walked and drove in the vicinity of Sandringham on Friday and Saturday last. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, with their suite, attended Divine service at Sandringham Church. The Rev. Canon Dr. Stanley officiated. The Rev. G. B. Moxon preached the sermon. It is expected that their Royal Highnesses will leave Sandringham on Friday (Saturday) for Windsor on a visit to the Queen, after which they will take possession of their London residence, Marlborough House, which has undergone an immediate thorough, and we may say workmen, under Messrs. Holland and Son, will proceed with the decorations and furnishing.

Admiral Seymour, Commander of her Majesty's yacht Victoria and Albert, has been on a visit at Sandringham.

PRINCESS LOUIS OF HESSE.

The following bulletin of the health of Princess Louis of Hesse, signed by Drs. Locock and Farre, has been issued:—

Darmstadt, April 13, 1863.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE opened on Saturday last with an edict which promises brilliant and successful season. Mr. Mapleson is showing himself an able and spirited lessee. The first sign of good management was apparent on entering the theatre. It is entirely "renovated"—newly painted, decorated, and rendered in many respects more commodious and comfortable, as well as more elegant, than it has been these many years. As the performance proceeded, it was seen that similar attention had been paid to the world behind the curtain. All the scenery was new, much of it was beautiful; and everything belonging to the spectacle was rich and gorgeous. The house was crowded to the doors, and the audience comprehended the elite of the aristocracy assembled in London. When the splendidly-dressed occupants of the boxes rose during the National Anthem the coup-d'œil was dazzling. The opera chosen for the occasion was the "Trovatore"—a piece certainly sufficiently "hackneyed," to use the word usually applied to it. But this merely means that the "Trovatore" has been more frequently performed, and is consequently better known to the public, than any other production, old or new, of the musical stage, than the work of a great composer. But if it means that the piece is "weary, stale, and unprofitable," then it is entirely erroneous. That the opera is not stale is proved by the crowds who flock to it whenever it is announced. That it is neither weary nor unprofitable is proved by the enthusiasm which it excites whenever it is well performed, and by the ample sums which it brings to the treasury. Mr. Mapleson, therefore, did well in selecting it for the opening of his theatre. Titiens, the reigning Queen of Song, appeared in all the power and splendour of her genius. Giuglini shone as the greatest of living tenors. Ardoni was the finest representative now on the stage of the wild and picturesque gipsy; and our countryman Santley made a good début to continue his career with. His great (real) Italian baritone on the opera stage. To enter into details respecting an opera so universally known, or performers so familiar to the public, would be superfluous and idle. We may add, however, that Verdi's chef-d'œuvre never was more magnificently performed, and never had a more brilliant audience. It was, in fact, a concert in honour of the nuptials of the Prince and Princess of Wales, written by Mr. John Oxenford, and composed by Mr. W. G. Cusins, was introduced between the second and third acts of the opera. It is needless to say that the performance of a work by Mr. Oxenford and Mr. Cusins was a success. Mr. Oxenford has shown as one of our most elegant poets; and, in the poem of this scenata, though a morceau of occasion, he has displayed his skill in touch the flowers of fancy into a chaplet for the Royal pair was worthy of his name. The music, too, from the pen of one of the most distinguished among our young and rising musicians, was worthy of the poem in melody, freshness, and grace. Yet it failed to produce the expected effect; and the reason was very evident by this was the case. On the first place, its production was too late—the excitement caused by the Royal marriage had subsided. In the second place, the manner of its production was not judicious. It was stuck between two acts of the opera, which was thus interrupted at the most interesting point; a thing which displeased the audience almost as much as it displeased us. Nobody was provided with books of the words, and it was evident, when the piece was finished, that very few persons knew a word of what it was or what it was about. The performance was in every respect excellent. Mdlle. Titiens, Signor Giuglini, and Mr. Santley, who sang the solo parts, were earnest in their exertions; the chorus was strong and effective, and the orchestra did justice to the composer's fine instrumentation. The scenata, as a concert piece of performance, could contend with such disadvantageous circumstances. Its merit, however, has been established, and its worth will be recognised by every one competent to judgeinto whose hands it may come; and several of its movements—especially the duet sung by Titiens and Giuglini, the trio for the three solo voices, and the ballad sung by Santley—will be found delightful things for the concert or the drawing-room. On Tuesday evening the opera of "Ernani" was given the "Puritani." In the character of Elvira Titiens displayed all her powers as an accomplished and impressive actress; and Giuglini sang with incomparable beauty, the part of Arturo being one of his finest characters.

We have already given an account of the opening of the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. On the second night a new singer, Mdlle. Fioretti, appeared in the character of Elvira, in the "Puritani." This lady is of high Continental reputation, and is not a novice on the stage. She is a most accomplished singer, gifted with a voice of no great power, but of exquisite sweetness and perfect truth of intonation. She is also a great power as an actress, but she has much intelligence and feeling, and is always interesting and pleasing.

Miss Carlotta Patti has been engaged by Mr. Gye, and appeared on Thursday at a concert, of which we shall next week give some account.

The MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS, interrupted by the Easter holidays, have been resumed with their usual crowded audience. Last night of Monday last was altogether excellent, and derived a special interest from the appearance of Vieuxtemps, the great Belgian violinist, after an absence from England of nearly seven years. He is looking well, and we have never heard him play more beautifully. The concerted pieces were Haydn's quartet in C (No. 1 of Op. 64); Beethoven's quartet in G, the third of the Razoumofski set; and the same composer's great quartet in E flat (No. 1 of Op. 74), in which Mr. Ware the pianist. M. Halle also played Beethoven's pianoforte sonata in G, op. 96, in his usual finished and masterly style. The singers were Miss Edith Wynne and Miss Eyles, both of them deservedly favourites of the public. St. James's Hall was crowded, as usual.

The MUSICAL UNION had the first matinée of its nineteenth season on Tuesday at the Hanover Square Rooms. Our musical readers are well acquainted with this institution, as we have recorded its proceedings during the whole period of its existence. It continues to be under the management of its able founder, Mr. John Ella, by whom its concerts are carried on with undiminished spirit and success. The programme of Tuesday last consisted of the following pieces:—Mozart's quartet in E flat, No. 4; Mendelssohn's duet in E flat for violin and pianoforte, No. 2, Op. 58; Spohr's duet in E minor; and a pianoforte solo of Chopin. The violins were Sainton, Ries, Blagrove, and Watson; the viola, Webb; and the violoncello, Piatti and Paque; and the pianist, Halle. The hall was crowded, and the audience, as usual, was aristocratic and fashionable.

"PRIZE OF HONOUR" WINNERS AT POISSY.

THE twentieth show at Poissy came off on the 1st inst., and was attended with more than usual éclat. The annual French exhibition, than the Great International of 1862. Most beautiful spring weather favoured the proceedings, and the number of the judges were terminated on the evening of March 31. As on the last occasion, M. Lefebvre de Sainte Marie, Inspector-General of Agriculture, was the president of the jury. Among the jurymen were M. Le General Baron de Béville and the Count de Bouillé, both distinguished breeders of cattle, and M. de Saint-Pierre, Count H. de Sergorlay and the Marquis de Torcy, members of the Corps Législatif. The entries were numerous, and the show of the present year was accorded to the thoroughbred Durham oxen and to the Durham crosses with French breeds; while the Devon, Hereford, and Scotch cattle had but few representatives. The Durham cattle breeds mustered well in the different classes, and the Charolais, Nivernais, and Limousin cattle were also well represented at the head in the show. The most weighty beast was a giant five-year-old Garonnais, fed by Mr. Martineau, of the department of Gironde. This immense beast, by the side of which even Mr. M'Combie's ever-memorable ox would have been dwarfed, stood 5ft. 9 in., and weighed 1210 kilos. (2666 lb. or 333 st.); but the colossal proportions procured it no favour from the jury, who might well be startled at the amount of offal in perspective.

The prize of honour for the best beast in the yard fell to the lot of M. Normanet, the well-known breeder of the department of the Nièvre for his Durham-Charolais ox, which we engrave. Its age was thirty-four months, and its weight 900 kilos. (1980 lb. or 247 st.).

POISSY CATTLE SHOW.

PRIZE OF HONOUR (COTSWOLD-BERRICHON) SHEEP, EXHIBITED BY M. LALOUEL DE SOURDEVAL.

This fine beast was bought for 2000 francs (£80), by M. Fleschalle, the celebrated butcher of the Place Geillon, who has for many years past purchased the bœufs gras, which figure in the fat-ox processions during the carnival.

Forty-two pens of sheep comprised the whole of the ovine division, and included merinos and Metis merinos, Dishley merinos, Cotswold berrichons, Southdown berrichons, and a few other breeds. The Cotswold blood held its own right well, and M. Lalouel de Sourdeval's splendid pen of ten Cotswold berrichons, one of which we engrave, bore off not only the prize in their class, but the prize of honour as well. His pen of ten were twenty-six months old, and weighed 892 kilos. (1960 lb.) It will be remembered that the same prize was awarded to this gentleman for the same cross last year.

There was only a small exhibition of pigs and calves, and the prize of honour for the former was won by a goodly nine months old Normon cochon, weighing 660lb.

The prizes were distributed at Poissy with the usual form on the afternoon of the public show (April 1), by M. de St. Marsault, Prefect of the Department of the Seine at Oise, who, in the absence of M. Rouher, the Minister of Agriculture, ably presided at the ceremony. Among the numerous breeders present, there was but one opinion as to the steady progress which had been made during the last two or three years by the judicious crossing of the most valued English breeds with the best native French races.

THE HERO: A Weekly Newspaper and Review.

There does not exist any weekly journal at which so many can be induced on the occasion of a marriage, a birth, or a death, to spend a penny. For obvious reasons the Hero is strictly speaking, no such thing as a weekly newspaper. It is proposed to THE HERO to print the earliest intelligence, but thoroughly the work of each week, and to present it in the fullest, clearest, and freshest manner. If the design be worthily executed the result should be a journal which, in the course of a year, will be found to be a history of the week's intellectual doings, and a faithful record of the progress of the human mind, as marked by the most able movements of the day, and in a more hidden manner unnoticed.

Not only will THE HERO contain the best of the literature of the week, it will devote much space to the reviews of Politics, Life, Letters, Art, and Science. Its tone will be quite free from party bias, and it will be the object of its Editor to make it the organ of the present union of those who, in different ways, are labouring for the best interests of mankind, earnest, practical, and elegant, and reflect the healthiest thought of the time. For this purpose the Editor has, and will, invite from time to time the co-operation of men who have already made a name in literature, and has been engaged; and careful may be assured that the criticism, whether of public affairs, or of books, or of art, will be free from all bias, and will be the result of the best judgment of the writer.

THE HERO will be issued in a form convenient for binding, and its price will be Sixpence.

A. Bunlop-street, Strand.

LONDON: SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1862.

WHEN the Royal Academy opens a large share of public attention will be attracted by a painting about to be sent in by one of our greatest artists, and to which a melancholy interest will be found to have attached itself when the work was within a few strokes of completion. It represents the political chiefs of our day grouped around the Speaker, and listening to Lord Palmerston's advocacy of the French Treaty. The very foremost, and the most prominent figure, will be in the likeness of a slight, calm, thoughtful man who is leaning forward, and intent upon the argument of the Premier, is now the last memorial of one who, three weeks ago, was actively doing his duty in the place objected for Mr. Phillip, but who has been suddenly taken away at an age when promotion and the continuance of valuable service. Sir George Cornewall Lewis had gone down to his Radnorshire mansion for the Easter holiday, and was there seized with a severe cold, whence congestion of the lungs ensued, and he was dead before the Queen's Writ was expired. The news was known to but few until Tuesday afternoon, and, when the Commons met for the second time since the recess, Mr. Walpole, the departed statesman's intimate friend and political opponent, moved the adjournment, as a mark of respect for one who was a true gentleman, under strong emotion, seconded the motion, and Mr. Disraeli supported it in a felicitously-worded eulogy, the more graceful from its having been unstudied, the leader of the Opposition having but a few minutes before heard of the loss which he said "the country could ill bear."

In a sense, we may assent to Mr. Disraeli's tribute. This nation, happily, is too great, too strong, and enjoys institutions too firmly founded in the living rock of liberty to be injuriously affected by the loss of any citizen. Our greatest, wisest, our wisest Prince, our keenest statesman, our bravest Admiral might depart, as they have departed at critical moments in our history, and yet, genuine as might be the grief, and serious as the loss, the fortunes of the country could never materially suffer. Under a despotism, where one man is the heart, head, and hand of the country, his death is a shock to order; under a democracy, where jealousies prevent any really great man from rising, the loss of the best man who has been permitted to rise means a disorder. But in England, where merit can always come to the front, the ranks are filled calmly, noiselessly, whenever a foremost man has fallen. We depend on no single man, and hold Britannia's blade,

Britannia's cause, and her aid.

Yet the death of a wise, able, and good man, whose best faculties are employed in serving the nation, must ever be a national calamity; and it is no exaggeration to say that we can ill spare Sir George Lewis. He was a type of the statesman for whom violent party passions and the unreasoned ideas, have small esteem—a fact which, in itself, is no small honour to him. Mere orator he was not, though his straightforward English talk, and, above all, his deep sense of justice, made his speeches far more acceptable to thinking hearers than are the showiest or the most adroit exhibitions of Parliamentary gladiators. We knew him as a man of high mind, of deep learning, and of a kind heart. We knew him not only superior to prejudices and superstitions, but also to the order of conscientiousness which permits a statesman to avail himself of both for the purposes of business. Such a lover, indeed, was he of fair play that he instinctively did the work of both sides in laying a case before his hearers; and though he had made up his own mind, he arrayed all the arguments against himself as well and so justly, that his opponents had to thank him for giving them so many chances with less occasion than himself. This is not the place to speak of the scholarship which gave him so high a position in the learned world. Slight justice is done in this country to men who follow two pursuits; mercantile people probably think better of them. Mr. Gladstone if he did not write books about Homer; and scholars speak only tolerably of Lord Derby's translations from Horace, because he runs horses and makes speeches. But now that Sir George Lewis no longer defends Estimates, the public will be taught to recognise his varied learning and sound philosophy.

It is, of course, no secret that a large number of persons, whose sufferings are very potent, looked forward to the time when a gallant octogenarian statesman should claim his well-earned coronet and retirement, and probably think the highest political office should be designated, and that these persons had thought that a very efficient Ministry, good for all working purposes, might be formed with Sir George Lewis as its chief. In a time of violence, or of strong party action, such a leader could not have held his own, but a man requiring a man who is much more "in evidence;" and who, moreover, is much less scrupulous in aiding friends and demolishing foes than the late Secretary for War could ever be. But in smooth times, those, we think, in which that is needed in a Premier is sound sense, ready vigour, and the good opinion of the nation, there might have been no reason against Sir George Lewis's accession to the highest office. He would have neglected no point of duty; he would have resigned in an instant, had he seen that his opinions of the country demanded a different kind of leadership; and he would have been one of the first to see this, when the case stood so. Hispriciples were Liberal; and though he has been reproached as too Whiggish, his intellectual perceptions were too keen to let him be fettered in action by any household traditions. His method in matters of dealing with the questions which the Disseigning interest has forced forward during the last two years was in perfect accordance with Liberalism, though his philosophic habit of thought inclined him to a sort of talk on those subjects which gave high offence to fanaticism on more than one score. He would have made a very practical Premier, and, unless stormy times arose, he would have navigated the ship to the satisfaction of the best class of passengers. More than this even our admiration for one of the ablest and most upright of men will not permit us to say, and it is no slight tribute to a statesman to allow that, under certain circumstances, he might have been trusted with the interests of England.

England deplores his loss, and if a world of the most respectful sympathy may be counted upon for the bereaved, a statesman regard as a stranger, thanks to her own contributions to its enjoyment, we would offer that word to the accomplished lady whose kindred tastes with those of her distinguished husband made her not only his best friend but his best companion. Sir George Lewis departs in the full possession of all his powers, and at a time when we were all becoming more and more aware of his merits. His premature demise is a subject of unmixed regret to his fellow-countrymen; but to his household there may be consolation in the thought that our memories of the lost statesman will be intellectually, of a piece "at his best," and, physically, of our great painter's sic sedebat.

Berlin now possesses four libraries for lending books to the working classes, containing 18,000 volumes. During the summer of persons who borrowed books was 511.

Prince Christian and his family arrived at Copenhagen last Saturday, and were received at the station by several of the Ministers and high officers of State.

At Louisville, in Kentucky, there is an annual tobacco show, at which prizes are given for the best specimen of manufacturing-leaf, chipping leaf, cutting leaf, cigar-leaf, &c. At the show in 1861 there were 1,000 casks and ten set of plated silver were for the lady in whose name is entered the best hogshead of leaf tobacco.

The men employed in making cuttings for the railway from Corbeil to Malun have recently found, about half a league from the latter place, a great number of columns and capitals, supposed to be the remains of one of the Merolah palaces which formerly existed in the neighbourhood of Corbeil.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BRIGHTON REVIEW.

On the next page we present our readers with an Engraving of "The Gallop Past" of the horse artillery division of the Hon. Artillery Company, and that of the "regular" cavalry at the review at Brighton on Easter Monday. When the whole body of infantry had performed this essential part in the programme of the day, Colonel M'Murdo rode across from the spot which the Staff occupied for inspection of the troops to the opposite side of the racecourse immediately in front of the Grand Stand, where the band was stationed, and told them to "play a quick time," as the artillery and cavalry would go by at the "gallop past." This manœuvre was given with telegraphic rapidity from one end of the Stand to the other, and thence to the spectators without who were next to this focus of attraction. All eyes were immediately directed with intense eagerness towards the course; and the first notes of a most lively air had scarcely died away before the horse troop of artillery belonging to the Hon. Artillery Company, headed by Captain Jay, came up at a dashing pace. The men were well mounted, and in an evident cue to follow their leader at whatever pace he liked to take them. Each of their guns was drawn by four horses which are kept specially, and used only for "gun work," and better horses for the purpose were never chosen or employed in the service of "The Royal Horse." From a gentle canter they gradually increased their pace till it reached a racing gallop, when no little anxiety was manifested for the safety of this amateur corps, from the knowledge that "drivers" of artillery require long and continuous practice before they can skilfully manage their difficult and dangerous duty. Confidence was, however, soon restored to the over-anxious spectators, and cries of "Bravo, bravo, H.A.C.!" were reiterated on all sides as they witnessed the "gallop past," not only unattended with any kind of mishap whatever, but proving in itself a perfect triumph of volunteer skill in the science of horse artillery, and an earnest testimony to the pluck of English gentlemen in the act of riding and driving, even though that driving be the very hazardous experiment, to amateurs, of a heavy gun-carriage, with its ponderous accompaniment. The efficiency of Captain Jay's horse troop has been repeatedly tested at reviews, but on no occasion more successfully than on Easter Monday. The idea of such a troop first originated with the late Prince Consort, and in its progress and development his Royal Highness took a deep and sincere interest. The formation of it was intrusted to Captain Jay, and to his indefatigable perseverance in keeping the members punctual to their drill and obedient to the able tuition of Mr. Reed, the riding master attached to the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards, and a picked Sergeant of the Royal Artillery, is their present high character as volunteer horse artillery essentially due. The 9th Lancers followed them, but at a pace which was comparatively slow when contrasted with that at which the Hon. Artillery Company had led the way.

This closed the ceremony of "marching past," and then the troops moved onwards to the scene of action, to take their respective parts in the "sham fight"—an incident in which, a charge of the London Scottish, is depicted on our first page. Slowly the enemy retreated up the hill, making a stand now and again, but with little chance of success, for under cover of the plantation Lord Elcho's brigade formed column, the London Scottish at their head, and advanced steadily up the hill. In vain Colonel Brewster brought up his main body and endeavoured to receive them in line. The Westminsters were hurrying up still further to the left, and in a few minutes he would have been outflanked. A crushing volley which the London Scottish delivered halfway up the hill completed his discomfiture, and he ordered his force to fall quickly back to gain the shelter of the 18-pounder battery on the opposite hill.

"A PRACTICAL JOKE," BY J. HAYLLAR, IN THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.—SEE PAGE 433.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House assembled for the first time after the Easter recess.

Mr. Gregory gave notice of a Motion as to Turkey, and another as to Ireland.

Mr. Fergus asked that he whilst Monday next to be given up for the discussion of the state of the cotton-manufacturing districts.

The Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Bill passed through Committee, and reported.

The Telegraphs Bill, as amended, was considered, some amendments made, and the House adjourned.

The Lords' amendments to the Salmon Fisheries Bill were considered and agreed to.

Sir H. Willoughby obtained leave to bring in a bill to consolidate and amend the laws relative to the internal management of prisons.

SUPPLY.—On the order of the day for going into Committee on the Civil Service Estimates, Votes 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6, Mr. Acton Ayrton called attention to a recent account of the growing disposition on the part of the Government to take the House by surprise by voting the public money in the absence of Members. Resolutions had not been in the hands of members more than two or three days. With a view to improving the matter, he therefore, he moved as an amendment, that the Administration case 1 be referred to a Select Committee. The motion having been seconded by Mr. Tenlawny, Mr. Peacocke, Mr. Hennessy, and others rose to take the House by surprise, and said that if the House would consent to proceed with the Civil Service Estimates this evening, they would not divide, but he was quite willing to postpone the first class. After some further discussion the amendment was withdrawn, and the House went into Committee on each of the various items of which were agreed to—£7,780,000 being voted for the administration of law and justice.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The House reassembled after the Easter recess.

The Metropolis and the Marine Stores Bills passed through Committee.

Post Office Savings Banks Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Earl of BEAUFORT.—The House was engaged for some time in a lively discussion on the Lord Chancellor's Augmentation of Benefices bill—Lord St. Leonards contending that the bill proposed to take away Glebe lands before it was passed, and added that the Crown ought to be consulted before any such measure was agreed to.—Lord DERBY supported the bill at some length. He considered that it would interfere with the working of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and entered into details with a view of showing that the benefices which had been chosen for sale were not the poorest in the city of the Lord Chancellor.—The Lord CHANCELLOR defended the bill from St. Leonards, said he had taken care to ascertain that the assent of the Crown would be given to the bill. As to the criticisms of Lord Derby, he received them as sugg estions for the improvement of the bill—The Select Committee to which the bill was to be referred was then appointed, and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE DEATH OF SIR G. C. LEWIS.—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.—The House assembled as usual at four o'clock, but soon afterwards adjourned, as a mark of respect to the memory of Sir G. C. Lewis, who died on the last on Radnorshire on Monday. The adjournment was moved by MR. WALPOLE, who cleverly read the paper from the Home Office announcing the melancholy incident of the Secretary for War.—Lord PALMERSTON, who appeared to be deeply affected, then moved that the House should adjourn as a mark of respect to the noble Lord, and in a few happy sentences summed up the virtues of the deceased statesman and scholar.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

Sir G. Grey stated that the Government proposed to fix the 17th inst. for the discussion of the question concerning the Electoral Disabilities removal bill.

The Gaming in Towns Protection Bill passed through Committee, as did the Oaths Relief in Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Bill.

A new writ was ordered for the return of a member for the borough of Thetford, in the room of Sir G. C. Lewis, who has accepted office.

An interesting debate took place upon the motion for the second reading of Sir Morton Peto's Burial Bill, the object of which is to allow the performance of divine offices at funerals in parish churchyards. Lord R. Cecil moved that the bill be read this day six months.—Mr. Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer and the opposition of Mr. Disraeli. On a division, the bill was rejected by 271 votes to 98.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Alkali Works Regulation Bill, after some discussion, was read a second time.

THE CROWN OF GREECE.—The Earl of MALMESBURY inquired of her Majesty's Government what was the present state of the negotiations respecting the Crown of Greece and the union of the Ionian Islands and Province of Corfu to that country. The noble Earl, in a speech of some length, commented upon the conduct of the foreign Minister in the case of the appointment of Prince William of Denmark to the throne of Greece.—Earl RUSSELL defended the course he had taken in regard to the candidature of the Danish Prince to the throne of Greece. The nomination of his Royal Highness was entirely conditional upon the consent of the Emperor of Russia and Prince Christian. In reference to Corfu, it should be recollected that England was only the trustee of the Ionian Islands, and therefore she was in a perfect right to propose its cession to Greece if she thought proper. If the Ionians wished to be united with the other Greeks, they were entitled to do so, subject to such an arrangement.—After some further conversation, in which the Earl of Derby and Lord Granville took part, the subject dropped.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

PRINCE ALFRED AND PRINCE LOUIS OF HESSE IN THE HOUSE.—Soon after the Speaker passed in the House, their Royal Highnesses Prince Alfred and Prince Louis of Hesse entered the gallery appropriated to distinguished strangers, and took their seats immediately under the Throne.

THE LANCASHIRE DISTRESS.—MR. FERRAND gave notice that it was his intention on the following evening to call attention upon the state of the discussion on the Lancashire distress:—"That it is the duty of the Government to take into consideration, without delay, what measures can be adopted to relieve the distress which prevails in the cotton-manufacturing districts."

THE EARTHQUAKE IN ARGOSTOLI.—MR. HORSMAN stated that it was his intention, on the 24th inst., to call the attention of the House to the seizure of the Alexander Liverpool.

CONFEDERATE AGENTS WATCHED BY OUR DETECTIVES.—Lord R. CECIL asked the Right Hon. the Home Secretary whether it was true that spies had been appointed to watch the movements of certain persons supposed to be Confederates in this country; and, if so, whether it was in consequence of an official letter received by the Foreign Minister from the United States Government complaining of the conduct of certain persons connected with the Confederate States in this country, in connection with the fitting out of vessels for privateering, the noble Lord wished to know whether such was the alleged fact. The result was the appointment of some members of our detective police to act as spies, which appeared to be contrary to the spirit of the law of this country. That proceeding was perfectly justifiable under the circumstances. There was no particular law from which foreign ambassadors were to be paid for their services beyond that usually set apart for the purpose.

THE BUDGET.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose at twenty minutes to five o'clock to make the financial statement. He observed that the last two years had been years of unusual pressure and anxiety, which might have led to serious expression in a resolution of the House of Commons, which stated that, while it desired that every practicable economy should be introduced into every part of the country as well as for the efficiency of the public service, it was likewise the feeling of the House that an effort should be made to reduce the taxation of the country. The Government, through the noble Viscount, acknowledged that that resolution was well founded, and that it was their duty to carry out, in the interest of the public, that particular attention should be paid to the subject. The reduction of income which followed the Victorian war necessarily exceeded the expenditure before that event. It was £4,664,000. In 1853-62 it increased to £9,000,000, showing an increase in those two years of £4,336,000; it rose to £2,845,000, being an increase in those two years of £1,511,000. But the average increase from 1861 has been £3,000,000, and the total estimates for fortifications, £1,135,000, and without the fortifications £1,000,000 increase in the expenditure of the year. He would now make a brief statement for the year 1862-3, and then, in order to avoid any trouble with regard to the figures, instead of comparing the whole expenditure, he compared that portion of it which was matter of discussion in the early part of the Legislature, because a large part of the ordinary national expenditure was due to the discharge of the necessary engagements of the country, whether they were liable, and a large part of the public funds guided by fixed rules, and which did not vary from year to year, the upward movement of which he had reverted. After striking off two important items which were to be regarded as fixed, we arrived, according to our calculations, at the ordinary charge of the debt and the charge of 4,000,000*l.* or 5,000,000*l.* for the collection of the national income, the expenditure depending upon the rate of taxation, and the votes of Parliament amounted in 1848-9 to 41,021,000*l.*, and in 1859-1 to 56,000,000*l.*, being an increase of 15,000,000*l.* in the last ten years on the whole. If they made the comparison with the year immediately preceding the Russian war, they found that that epidemic had increased from 29,311,000*l.*, the increase in the seven years up to 1861 being 15,614,000*l.* or more than 50 per cent. The causes of that increase were well known—namely, the growth and progress of naval and military science, the progress of parliamentary views in regard to the condition of those serving their country, which had led to great expense, the changes which had taken place in other nations, and the general growth of a spirit of expenditure. He did not think that the outlay by the Government had exceeded the public desire; but there could be no doubt that it had led to a great tension of the revenue. Last year, when he submitted the Estimates, the income and expenditure nearly balanced each other; but there were particular circumstances at that time which had a tendency to disturb that balance in an unfavourable sense. The Revenue to which he was much in excess the considerations of the House was remarkably hopeful one; but, in order to judge how far it was so, it was necessary to bear in mind the specialties of the case. In the first place, deep and wide-spread distress had been prevalent in Lancashire, the manufacturers of the cotton famine every Englishman had referred to Lancashire with pride and satisfaction as meaning the most remarkable of all the symbols which could be presented of the power, the progress, and the prosperity of England. Towards Lancashire, the whole country now felt even more warmly than at any former period, in consequence of the noble manner in which the people of that district had borne their privations and sufferings. The price of cotton in 1860 had been 7*d.* and 8*d.* per pound; it rose to between 13*d.* and 14*d.* in 1862, and in January last it was 27*d.* per pound. That extraordinary calamity, when as a whole, had not only continued at the point it reached in 1862, but had, in part, increased. Accordingly, 1*d.* per pound represented a million sterling. The other special cause of depression had been the state of Ireland. Up to 1719 it was known that Ireland was increasing in wealth and population by exports; but then the state of progress was materially checked. Between 1719 and 1729 the exports were at the rate of 1,500,000*l.* and 1730 was 2,947,000*l.* per annum. In 1860-1 the value fell to 18,893,000*l.*; in 1861-2 it fell to 18,000,000*l.*, and in 1862-3 it would be 17,000,000*l.*, a decrease of somewhat more than 12,000,000*l.* The effect first fell on the agricultural interest, and the consequent reduction of income-tax in the 1861-2 the exemption amounted to 2,463,000*l.*, whilst in 1862-3 it had risen to 3,000,000*l.* The total reduction of income-tax in the two years was 7,038,000*l.* The real expenditure was 69,202,000*l.*, being less by 800,000*l.* than the estimate. The total revenue was 70,602,000*l.*, showing a surplus over the expenditure of 1,400,000*l.*, and in 1861-2 the surplus was estimated at 1,700,000*l.*, but he calculated that there would be a deduction in the actual receipts of 300,000*l.*, leaving a surplus of 1,400,000*l.* The actual revenue, therefore, was estimated at 70,450,000*l.* The actual produce was 70,602,000*l.*, showing an increase of 152,000*l.* upon the estimated receipts, a but large when considered with reference to the peculiar circumstances of the country. In the estimates presented to the House in 1861 the Government had produced an excess over the estimate of 467,000*l.*; the amount of credits taken in 1861-2 was 1,000,000*l.*, leaving a deficiency of 533,000*l.* In the 212,000*l.*; the excise showed a large deficiency in comparison with the estimates, and the stamps 100,000*l.* The total deficiency in the year to be deducted the drawback on hops;—the principal deficiency must be attributed to the cotton famine. The total revenue for 1862-3 was estimated at 70,600,000*l.*, but produced only 5,392,000*l.*, showing a deficiency of 1,208,000*l.* The expenditure for the year was estimated at 69,202,000*l.*, and produced 9,394,000*l.*, showing a deficiency of 606,000*l.* The difference in respect to the year 1862-3 was owing to changes which had occurred in the time of assessing the duty, which rendered it impossible to make an accurate estimate. The duty on tea was more than 100 per cent; the duty collected was a million less in the excise. The wonder was that there had not been a far greater deficiency in the revenue than had occurred. It was a fact that the whole amount of the revenue which he had anticipated from the spirit duties would be lost. The consumption of spirits in Ireland had fallen off 1,000,000 gallons; but the 600,000*l.* which he anticipated on foreign and colonial spirits would be lost. The 1,000,000 gallons of spirits which had been withheld from consumption in Ireland had been distilled in England, and the duty on them would be lost. The duty on spirits, in 1861 it was 9,702,000*l.*, in 1862 it was 9,300,000*l.*, and in 1863 it was 9,100,000*l.* The reason for this, which was the first year of the new duty, had the failure to receive the full amount anticipated from the additional duty to be levied on the 10th of April. He had calculated that the loss on that occasion he believed that there never had been a period when there had been less risk of failure in the receipt of the revenue. He had endeavoured to draw a contrast between the effects of the duties upon the excise revenue and upon the customs and stamps and taxes. The excise revenue principally consisted of articles, such as spirits, beer, malt, hops, tobacco, sugar, coffee, chicory, tea, spices, and tobacco. The gross revenue of 1861-2 was 23,000,000*l.*, and the net revenue was 20,000,000*l.* The charge upon the Consolidated Fund to 7,840,000*l.*; any remission of duty, therefore, was met by a corresponding reduction of charge. The miscellaneous items, 7,092,000*l.* There was a reason which he was not able to state, but which he understood, as there was a large amount of which were yet doubtful. For instance, the packet estimate had not yet been settled with the contractors. It was therefore impossible for him yet to be instructed as to enable her Majesty's Government to make a positive proposal, as to the amount which would be required to do a part the arrangements with regard to the West India mail service which had been under consideration. He therefore thought it right, for the precise figure; but the items, together with the charge which would to be paid to the Bank of England for the Queen for the further issue of notes now held by the National Debt Commissioners, would amount to somewhere between 1,000,000*l.* and 1,100,000*l.* The charge for the Civil Service Estimates, the gross amount would be 6,762,000*l.*, and the total estimated expenditure would be 69,202,000*l.* The sum for fortifications, which Parliament had decided should be paid for in annual votes of 1,000,000*l.* sterling, was 1,135,000*l.* The total charge for 1862-3 would be 70,337,000*l.*, but still higher than the estimate of 1862-3 by 1,135,000*l.* The receipts of which would amount to the following:—

Stamps	9,500,000
Taxes	1,100,000
Income Tax	10,900,000
Post Office	3,500,000
Crown Lands	360,000
Chinese Indemnity	450,000
Total	£71,450,000

As the total amount of estimated expenditure was 69,202,000*l.*, there was a difference in favour of estimated income over estimated charge of 2,247,000*l.* This sum he came to propose to the House to give. In the first place, he proposed to raise the duty on chicory to that which was now levied on coffee. He proposed to raise the duty on chicory to that which was now levied on coffee. He proposed to raise the duty on chicory to that which was now levied on coffee. He

COUNTRY NEWS.

A formal contradiction is given to the rumour respecting the intended retirement of Sir A. W. Buller from the representation of Devonport.

The Liverpool Scottish Society presided over the 77th anniversary of the annual soirée of the Huddersfield Mechanics' Institution. He strongly advocated promotion of national education on the principle of the Irish plan proposed for accomplishing this great result which was not preferable to the existing state of things.

A singular trial for inciting to murder has been before the Dublin Criminal Court. A man named Harcourt was charged by two witnesses with having written to them in Dublin and offered them £5 each to shoot a gentleman at Newry, on the plea that he libelled his wife, whom, it was stated, the accused had married to marry. The prisoner was found guilty, and remanded to ten years' penal servitude.

Mr. R. W. Sibthorp, the artist, has just presented to the Hunterian Library and Scientific Institution a portrait of its president, Mr. W. F. Donkin, M.D., Oxon. The portrait was painted by the late Mr. Sibthorp in 1840, and by whose munificence it has been largely sustained. The portrait, an excellent likeness, is "as right mannerly and worthy a gentleman as Dantsaghe," says Mr. Williams, "that he shall ever bear in mind that they were the first to encourage him at his commencement of his artistic career."

The Commission of Inquiry into the working of the scientific institutions in Dublin met at the Bankruptcy-court yesterday for the first time. The Commissioners are Archbishop Whately, Sir Thomas Larcom, the Rev. Dr. Lardner, Gilbert, Jellicoe, Parke, and De Wilton were among the other gentlemen present. The Commission has been issued to inquire into the £100 and upwards. The second one is carried forward, in consequence of the Bankruptcy-court not sitting.

On Sunday night the Seaton Carew life-boat, belonging to the National Lifeboat Institution, was the means of rescuing the crew of seven men belonging to the brig Regalia, of Whitby, from Hamburg, in ballast, which, during the night, ran ashore from the west and in a heavy gale stranded at the mouth of the River Tees. The vessel's crew burnt tar-barrels as signals of distress, and were having been observed by the life-boat crew, they immediately launched the boat to the assistance of the distressed sailors. The cost of this vessel, which was contributed to the National Lifeboat Institution, three or four years ago, by William M'Kerrell, Esq. She has since been the means of saving the crews of the following vessels:—The Lord Nelson, 30 tons, Middlesborough, 7; Brig Mary Flower, of Newcastle, 8; Brig Providence, of Shields, 8; Brig Mary Ann Watson, of Sunderland, 12; and Brig Regalia, of Whitby, 7: total number of lives saved, 35.—The Rev. W. M. Kingsmill Eastmead Chaplain of Dover Castle, near Deal, Surrey, has received from the Life-boat Institution £21 12s., being the amount deposited in the Mint-box of the parish church of Deal for their institution.

A large meeting was held last Saturday, in St. George's Hall Liverpool, under the presidency of the Mayor, at which resolutions unanimously passed expressive of sympathy with the Poles, and indignation at the conduct of Russia in Poland. On Thursday week Mr. Rathbone presided at a meeting of the Sheffield committee for raising subscriptions in aid of Poland. He congratulated the members of the committee on having received a donation from the Poles. They might assist Poles to get back to their country, but once there they would be delivered into the hands of Russia. He thought the whole conduct of Russia with respect to Poland with the deepest abhorrence; but, balancing all the evils of the case, he felt it to be the duty of Poles to stay rather conclusion than that the revolt would be put down with an iron hand. Mr. Rathbone then moved a resolution in favour of an independent Poland. Russia and Prussia were resolved to stick to their ill-gotten territory. A European war in the interests of Poland was out of the question. Poland must help herself, because the republican of Poland would decline to send representatives; and his opinion was that the country, so far as this country is concerned, was not dead in the hands of the Government, which had promised to do everything that diplomacy could accomplish to ameliorate the condition of Poland.

Sir A. P. Gordon Cumming writes to the Elgin Courier:—"In answer to the Inverness and Perth Railway Company's application to Parliament, Mr. Aligye, we have unceremoniously trespassed on the privacy and retirement of a numerous colony of ancient hawks. The estate of Altyre, from 1790 to 1795, deep, the lower part being through from 10ft. to 16ft. of ironstone and sandstone conglomerate. The remaining old residences are from 8ft. to 12ft. deep, and about 10ft. to 20ft. below the surface, where they certainly must have been severed unwittingly by the labourers at the time of the work. They are to be preserved as the heavy handpick or the green iron crowbar; but a blast of powder, of course, cannot be spared, some of the rocks are so large. Several nests in the establishment, as a shot is sometimes the means of exposing so many as a dozen of the sleepy old fellows. They must not be left to die a long repose, but, after giving a few winks at the 'new light' thus suddenly let in upon them, and having several gasps of the unwonted air, they are carefully and deliberately proceed to hop and crawl down the line along the sill of watercourse to some of the lower beds. I have seen them in considerable numbers the nests have awaited above forty at once.

On Saturday night week the Scottish Union, and Nationalbank, Chamberlain, of the gentlemen who invited the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science to hold its meetings in that city, developed the plan which for procuring the necessary funds for defraying the expenses connected with the meeting. The plan was a liberal and influential subscription, and the steps taken by Treasurer Cowper, convener of the Finance Committee, in the absence of the Lord Provost. Professor Archer one of the committee gave to the assembly intimated that the estimated expenses of the meeting of the association would be from £600 to £1000; and, as they were in the position of hosts who invited guests to visit the city, it was necessary that steps should be taken forthwith to raise funds to entertain their guests in a proper manner. In Glasgow the plan adopted was a very simple and efficient one—namely, that the requisitionists made themselves guarantees to the extent of £10 each. The number of requisitionists in Edinburgh was over 300, so that a much smaller sum would require to be raised by each. Perhaps the best method would be to recommend the requisitionists to obtain subscriptions to the extent of £5 each, so that the full sum required would be raised even though a number might not obtain subscriptions to the full extent of £5. On the motion of Bailie Blackadder, seconded by Mr. Samuel J. Wood, the recommendation of Professor Archer was adopted unanimously, and the meeting separated.—Scotsman.

The Queen has approved of Mr. Edwin G. Eastman as Consul at Cork; of Lord Dacre of Austria; and of Mr. Eduardo Clifton Conran as Consul at Falmouth, and of Mr. Diego Lloyd as Vice-Consul at Liverpool, for the Argentine republic.

The friends and supporters of the Manchester School of Art assembled at the Royal Institution yesterday week, and an hour was pleasantly spent in examining the works of art lent by the Department of Science and Art and by various local contributors, with which the rooms devoted to the institution were filled. At eight o'clock the ladies and gentlemen present assembled in the theatre, where Sir J. Kay-Shuttleworth, M.P., Mr. Cobden, Mr. Muckley, the Head Master, read the report, from which it appeared that, notwithstanding the severe commercial pressure under which the district and the neighbourhood, the numbers in the artizan classes were on the increase. Thirty schools of design, with an attendance of 3,000 pupils, and more than 2,000 individuals were receiving instruction in drawing through the aid of the School of Art. Of those attending the classes, 1,000 were females. At the second school, 202 prizes had been awarded by the department to the whole of the pupils. Mr. Muckley's report, which was read, stated that the new buildings had been selected by the Government Inspector for national competition All the buildings in the competition were selected by the Board of Trustees of Science and Art in removing from the Manchester school the customary annual exhibition of works in the Industrial Exhibition, which consisted of books, models, trees of colours, and of mathematical instruments, to the Government School of Art at Somerset House. This was done to give a definite purpose in life, to win their way step by step, and to encourage the students to look forward to the time when they would be called upon to do the industrial art of this district.—Manchester Guardian.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, at a special meeting yesterday week, adopted a report of the committee to the effect that the Reciprocity Treaty was virtually at an end by the withdrawal in British ports manifestly contravened the intention of the Foreign Enlistment Act; that the Act was inoperative, and that the report of the Commissioners was no easy evasion, and that its insufficiency in this respect tended to excuse our Provincial Government in the eyes of the Independents of the United States, credents which in future might be turned with harassing effect upon ourselves. It was resolved that the report be forwarded to Lord Elgin, and to Mr. Rich Russell, and his attention called to it; and that the president of the Chamber, Mr. Moses Judah, and Messrs. Henry Lunn and Thomas Cramp, members of the association, and furnishing them with a copy of the report. At the commencement of the meeting Mr. Cramp, the vice-president, was unanimously elected to the chair, and it was decided not to entertain a report from the Board of Trade, but to refer the matter to the Council, with the whole country of war ships for the Confederates.—Sir William Brown, of Liverpool, in a letter to the Mayor of that town, dated from Paris on Saturday last, says he has advocated, through the agency of a poli several, resolutions of certain anti-slavery meetings held in Paris, and which he has acted; and he considers that his firm has acted as Federal agents for the supply of warlike stores, and that the Federal Government has not violated the neutrality of the and American bonds, as it has shipped any of the articles which may usually be employed for warlike purposes. He has also written to Mr. Seward to point out that this is no infringement of the law or the Queen's neutrality proclamation, which he says he has read with attention, and that no substantial contradiction is given to the statement that the Messrs. Laird, of Birkenhead, are building vessels of war for the Confederates. He says that he is sure the Government has ordered the workmen employed upon the alleged Confederate vessels to desist, in the hands of the authorities.

THE DISTRESS IN LANCASHIRE.

At the meeting of the Central Committee in Manchester on Monday it was announced that the subscriptions amounted, including £1,000 from the Queen, £40,000; leaving a balance in hand of £412,535 9s. 2d. Mr. Farnall reported further applications for relief from Ashton, Hyde, and Dukinfield, and from districts in the cotton-manufacturing districts; but he also shows that 114,439 individuals, or a total number of 22,887 families, in the districts from which he included in his tables, are supported either by the poor rates or by charity. The total amount received by the Central Relief Committee, from the country or the various workhouses, who number 11,458. Various grants were made.

The Manchester Commercial Association met on Tuesday week at midnight. The total amount received is £478,000, and the total disbursements £317,000, leaving a balance in hand of £161,000, exclusive of the £40,000 and those from the colonies to-day. The committee discussed the question of emigration, and the opinion was expressed that it would be better to give a considerable sum from the fund as their disposal to assist Lancashire people to emigrate than to allow the emigration fund to be used for that purpose. Grants to the amount of £5785 were made.

An influential meeting was held in the Manchester Townhall, at which a resolution was passed in favour of assisting them of the unemployed to emigrate to Australia, and a committee was appointed to take further measures.

Edmund Potter, Esq., M.P., presided at a meeting held, in a speech at Whitehall, he pronounced a warm eulogium on the Lancashire operatives, and on the manner in which they had borne the distress. He said that the entire Lancashire population, with the exception of a few thousands, were subscribers in Ashton-under-Lyne, when the recent riots which have taken place in Ashton-under-Lyne, when the recent riots which have taken place in the doings of the Lancashire operatives, and as address was adopted for presentation to the Queen. Upwards of 10 delegates attended, representing almost every school in the three towns.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

This increasing abundance of money, the low rate of discount, the more limited demand for bullion for export purposes, together with the large supply of that precious metal offered for sale by the Bank of England at the present state of the Continental exchanges, have produced greater firmness in the value of the public securities. The Funds, however, have been kept down by means extensive, and the Unfunded Debt has continued inactive, at its present high rate of quotation. The measure proposed to be submitted and introduced into the House of Commons by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and embracing the principle of certificates and coupons for the bulk of the National Debt, will have considerable influence upon the market value of Exchequer Bills; consequently, there is very little disposition shown to invest in them.

In the Stock Exchange the rates for advances on Government Securities have declined to 2 and 1½ per cent.

No change of importance has taken place in the value of money on the Continent, and the demand, generally, is far from active. According to the last return, the stock of bullion in the Bank of France was £14,769,972, being an increase since the 1st of January last of £4,338,240.

The quotation for bankers' bills at New York, at the latest date, was 4¾, and the premium on gold 1¼ per cent.

Advices from India report a further improvement in the value of Government Securities. At Calcutta the Five-and-a-Half per Cents have been dealt in at 118½, and at Bombay 119½.

There was a moderate business doing in Home Stocks on Monday. Prices, however, were a shade higher, and all Indian Securities were very firm. On Tuesday there was a slight advance in most of the securities. Wednesday's business was moderately active, at full quotations. On Thursday the markets showed increased firmness. Consols, for Money and Account, realised 99¼ to 99⅜; the Reduced and New Three per Cents, 99½ to ⅝; and Exchequer Bills, 6s. dis. to par. India Five per Cent Stock sold at 103½ to ¾.

Increased firmness has been observed in the markets for Conference Scrip, and the quotations have ranged from 1 to ¼ premium.

Rather a limited business has been transacted in Joint-Stock Bank Shares; nevertheless, prices have been firm.

There has been a fair demand for Colonial Government Securities, and the Miscellaneous Market has ruled steady.

The Railway Share Market has been tolerably firm, and, in some instances, the quotations have slightly improved.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE April 15.—The quantity of home-grown wheat on offer here to-day was very moderate, but in fair average condition. The general samples of both old and white were taken off steadily; at full quotations; but low and damp qualities ruled very inactive, and 1s. per qr. lower. Foreign wheat was in good request, and 1s. per qr. dearer than on the late rates. The sale for barley was slow, and the quotations were 1s. per qr. lower than last week. Good sound oats were held at extreme rates. Inferior sorts met a dull inquiry, and were realised former quotations. Beans and peas the inquiry for them was rather moderate. The finer lots were steady.

MARK LANE, Monday.—Business doing in our market, to-day, was much restricted and inactive, compared with last week. Fine wheat was in good request, and 1s. dearer.

Liverpool.—The demand for raw cotton is moderately active, and in some instances a trifle higher. The sales of the week are 40,000 bales, of which 5,000 bales are on speculation, and 2,000 bales for export. In Yarns and Fabrics there is no change. There is more doing in refined goods, at very full prices. Common brown lumps are selling at 43s. per cwt.; crushed, 44s.; grocery ditto, 45s. per cwt. In the sugar market, to-day, refined sold 3,000 loaves last week.

Manchester.—Yarns and fabrics are off steadily, at quite last week's prices. The supply in warehouse is very large. Business is restricted to retail.

Hops.—The market is tolerably firm, at previous rates. The stock is 34,843 tons, against 18,276 tons last year.

Provisions.—Irish butter is still very inactive. In prices, however, the fluctuations are trifling. Foreign qualities are in fair request, at full prices. Bacon is in moderate supply, and the prices per cwt. have undergone no change. Hams are in good demand, and the rates for them have been

Lard.—The demand is very inactive. Y.Y.C., on the spot, is selling at 42s. 6d. to 43s.; and for May, 44s. per cwt. Rough fat, 2s. per 8lb. The stock of butter is 42,938 casks, against 34,362 casks last year. Rough fat, 2s. 2d. per 8lb.

Tallow.—The demand for Town Tallow is steady, at 41s. 6d. per cwt. for Y.C. on the spot; and for delivery over the next three months, at 42s. 6d. per cwt. The stock is 24,830 casks, against 20,892 casks last year. Town Tallow, 41s. per cwt. Soap Tallow, 42s. per cwt. Yellow Rosin, 14s. to 14s. 6d. for Fine Soda. Rough fat, 2s. per 8lb.

Sperm oil is in moderate request, at £85 per tun. Whale oil is dull, at £36 per tun. Turpentine is in fair request, at 46s. 6d. per cwt. Linseed oil-cake is in fair request, at £6 5s. per ton. Rape cake is dull, at £5 10s. per ton. Rosin is quiet at 14s. 6d. per cwt. Hemp is quiet, at £41 10s. per ton. Jute is dull, at £20 per ton. Clive is quiet, at 34s. per cwt. Sugar is in good request, 2s. 6d. to 3s. per quarter.

Coals.—Newcastle, in the river, £3 to £4 4s.; sliver, £3 10s. to £3 15s.; and stiver, £1 10s. to £1 15s. per load.

Coals.—Best house coals, 16s. 6d. to 17s. 6d.; seconds, 14s. to 15s. 6d.; Hartley's, 13s. 6d. to 14s. per ton; small coals, 9s. to 10s. 6d. per ton.

Hops.—The parcels are in moderate request, at full prices, but all other kinds are very dull. The duty is £140,000. The stock is 34,843 tons, against 18,276 tons last year. Duty in 1854, £140,000; and in 1853, £145,000.

Wool.—There is very little business doing in any kind, and the quotations are nearly nominal.

Potatoes.—The supplies are unusually good, and the trade is steady, at from 6s. to 10s. per cwt.

Manchester Cattle Market, Monday.—The unfavourable weather which prevailed on the to-day's market was only limited, the demand for all breeds ruled very inactive, at Monday's prices. Beasts, sheep, and calves, from Lincolnshire, were only moderately good. In pigs, in pens, however, no further change took place. The best Downs, in the wool, sold at 5s. 2d. per 8lb. Lambs, 6s. 4d. to 6s. 8d. per 8lb. Calves, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 8d. per 8lb. Pigs, 4s. to 4s. 2d. per 8lb. Of foreign cattle, 1,000 head were imported, the veal trade was heavy, at 5d. per 8lb. less money. ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE WAR IN AMERICA.

THE TOWN AND FORTIFICATIONS OF SAVANNAH.

Our View of Savannah is taken from Fort Bloggs, looking up the Savannah River. "Fort Bloggs," writes our Special Correspondent, "is the left flanking work of the land defences of the city; and below it, in the event of an attack, the river batteries may be expected to do all that is required of them. As I write news has been brought in that the Northern Sothis are moving out of Port Royal, and from appearances it is presumed they are going into the Savannah River. The long-looked-for fight may come off within the next forty-eight hours. I shall be there whenever it takes place with General Beauregard, who has invited me to accompany his staff. Foster and Hunter, the Northern Generals, have between forty and fifty thousand men, but I don't think they will meet with any better success than Burnside did at Fredricksburg."

PLANTATION NEGROES WORKING ON THE DEFENCES OF CHARLESTON.

Since the breaking out of the civil war there has been but little planting going on near the seaboard of South Carolina in consequence of the too close proximity of the Northern forces. The planters, therefore, are glad to turn over gangs of their negroes to the military authorities, by whom they are usefully employed in constructing earthworks. There seems little reason to doubt that the negroes work contentedly enough at the task of riveting their fetters still more tightly upon themselves. Nor is their ragged look to be in any way attributed to the existence of want or misery among them, to their masters' neglect, or to their own indifference to their personal appearance. The negro is perfectly willing to go about his work in rags for six days in the week provided that on the seventh he may attire himself in a garb of outrageous brilliancy. "The very men," writes our Correspondent, "portrayed in my sketch have more than once made me feel uncommonly mean and shabby when I have met them on Sunday in all their splendour and been forced to contrast my own well-worn and somewhat shabby attire with their brilliant costumes. The old uncle in front, who is shown leading off with his rammer, is what is here termed the 'boss' nigger or head man of the party. The rest are under his especial control, and over them he exercises his power in a right lordly fashion. As those who are working below throw up the earth, the labourers above, headed by the boss nigger, pace slowly forward and backward with their rammers, keeping perfect time, and accompanying their labour with some such ditty as the following :—

I don't like the lowland gal;
Tell you de reason why?
She comb her hair wid a herring-bone,
And dat dont please my eye.

But I do like de mountain gal;
Will you but hab de reason why?
She comb her hair wid de tortoise-shell,
And her movements am so spry!

As a rule, the negroes appear to be the most contented labourers at this and similar work imaginable, and, what with their singing and constant chattering, do as little for their living as any class of men I ever saw."

THE ATTACK ON FORT M'ALLISTER.

Our Correspondent writes as follows respecting the attack by the Federal gun-boats on Fort M'Allister, which took place on March 2 :—"As I was making up my packet, ready to send off by the first chance, I heard of a movement of the Federal gun-boats from Port Royal towards Savannah. Leaving the envelope open, I started to Fort M'Allister, on the Ogeechee, 150 miles off, believing that to be the point threatened, and arrived there just in time to be present at the attack. There were three turreted ironclads and a mortar-boat engaged, each ironclad being armed with a 15-inch and 11-inch gun. After eight hours of incessant firing the ironclads drew off, leaving, however, the mortar-boat still engaged, which kept throwing shell into the fort the greater portion of the night. To-day (the 3rd) none have resumed the attack, but how long it may be before the ball is renewed it is impossible to say. The Federals are exceedingly anxious to take the position, as it will enable them to turn the right of the Savannah defences by reaching the Gulf Railroad. The damage to the fort was trifling—the parapets and revetments somewhat knocked about, a gun dismounted, and a few men injured. It is calculated that at least fifty tons of metal were thrown into the work. My sketch is very rough, as it was made amidst flying sand and earth, besides which I had to keep dodging pretty briskly. We hear that the Federal transports are landing troops lower down; if so, we shall have it hot and strong."

"A PRACTICAL JOKE."

We have already, in our notice of the British Institution exhibition, offered a few critical remarks upon the clever and amusing picture now engraved.

THE WAR IN AMERICA: THE TOWN AND FORTIFICATIONS OF SAVANNAH.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

What we then said need not, therefore, be repeated. In those remarks, however, we observed that there are several versions of the incident represented; and that between the rather questionable authority quoted in the catalogue—viz., "The Landmarks of English History"—and the story as re'ated in Noble's "Memoirs of the Cromwell Family," the only authority which then occurred to us, there were some trifling discrepancies. We have since been reminded (thanks to the courtesy of the editor of Notes and Queries) that the incident is narrated in Oldmixon's "History of England." And as this is probably the origin of all the subsequent versions of this well-known story, including that given by Noble, we will quote it in the quaint words of the author:—"One of his (Oliver Cromwell's) domestick chaplains, Mr. Jeremy White, a sprightly man and a top Wit of his Court, was so ambitious as to make his addresses to Lady Frances, the Protector's youngest daughter. The young Lady did not discourage him; and this Piece of innocent Gaiantry in so religious a Court, cou'd not be carry'd on without spies. Oliver was told of it, and he was much concern'd at it, obliging the Person who told him to be on the Watch; and if he cou'd give him any substantial Proof, he should be well rewarded, and White severely punish'd. The spy followed the matter so close that he hunted Jerry White, as he was passarily term'd, to the Lady's Chamber, and ran immediately to the Protector with this News. Oliver, in a rage, hastened thither himself, and going in hastily found Jerry on his Knee kissing the Lady's Hand, or having just kiss'd it. Cromwell, in a Fury, ask'd what was the Meaning of that Posture before his Daughter Frank? White, with a great deal of Presence of Mind, said, 'May it please your Highness, I have a long Time courted that young Gentlewoman there, my Lady's Woman, and cannot prevail; I was, therefore, humbly praying her Ladyship to intercede for me.' The Protector, turning to the young Woman, cry'd, 'What's the meaning of this, Hussey? Why do you refuse the Honour Mr. White wou'd do you? He is my Friend, and I expect you shou'd treat him as such.' My Lady's Woman, who desir'd nothing more, with a very low Courtesy reply'd, 'If Mr. White intends me that Honour, I shall not be against him.' 'Stayt thou so, my Lass,' cry'd Cromwell, 'call Goodwyn, this business shall be done presently, before I go out of the Room.' Mr. White was gone too far to go back. The Parson came. Jerry and my Lady's Woman were marry'd in Presence of the Protector, who gave her 500 Pounds for her Portion; and that, with the Money she had sav'd before, made Mr. White easy in his Circumstances, except in one Thing, which was that he never lov'd his Wife, nor she him, tho' they liv'd together near fifty Years afterwards. I knew them both, and heard this Story told when Mrs. White was present, who did not contradict it, but own'd that there was something in it." It is said in Noble's "Memoirs" that there had been some talk of marrying this Lady Frances to the young Charles II.; but Cromwell would not hear of it, thinking his character too loose, and that "the son would never forgive the death of the father."

From the extract we have given, and from other less direct evidences, it would seem that Jerry White was not exactly the lean, sneaking, ill-favoured fellow Mr. Haylar has represented him; and, moreover, that the young lady herself was not unfavourable to his suit, and not likely, therefore, to so readily become a party to the Protector's grim and mercilessly "practical joke." The story, however, whether based on truth or not, is one which we may be sure has not suffered by repetition, and the artist was perfectly justified in giving it a new reading, especially since he has illustrated it so admirably. It supplied, we may add, the late Mr. Egg, R.A., with the subject of a picture exhibited in 1842, with the title "Cromwell discovering his Chaplain, Jeremiah White, making love to his Daughter Frances." We do not remember this work, and cannot, therefore, say whether Mr. Haylar's picture bears any resemblance to it.

THE TECHAS PASS, BILBAO-TUDELA RAILWAY, SPAIN.

Of the many scenes of remarkable beauty and interest which the completion of the Bilbao-Tudela Railway will open to the traveller in the north of Spain there is none which will be more attractive to the English tourist than the pass of which we have given a representation, from a drawing by Percival Skelton. So bold and able a work as this railway is must excite considerable admiration. Its execution is due to the well-known professional skill of Charles Vignoles, Esq., engineer-in-chief of the line. It may be remembered that a large model, showing the peculiar difficulties of constructing this railway through a chain of the Cantabrian Pyrenees, was exhibited at the late International Exhibition, and attracted much public attention. In the Techas Pass a tunnel of some seventy yards has been carried through the solid rock. The River Bayas, which forces its way through the narrow channel of the pass, is crossed obliquely by the bridge seen in the illustration, and the railway is then carried along the opposite side of the gorge, for two-thirds of a mile, to the village of Subijana, at the other extremity of the defile. There is much to excite the curiosity and conjecture of the geologist in the study of these rocks, which bear upon their huge buttresses evident proofs of the action of water at an astonishing elevation above the present course of the river at their base. But the chief interest in the Techas Pass is the historical fact of Wellington having held, in the house still standing at the entrance of the gorge at Subijana, his head-quarters on the night before the battle of Vittoria. It was by the rough mountain road seen in the illustration that the Anglo-Spanish corps, strong in artillery, defiled through the pass, and, following the valley of the Bayas, descended into the plain of Vittoria at a critical moment and turned the right wing of the French army. From the summit of these rocks a general view of the plain of Vittoria may be gained, and Napier's graphic description of the battle can be realised from its beginning to its glorious close. We hear with much gratification that on the completion of the works of the line the numerous staff of engineers have presented two handsome vases, executed by Messrs. Elkington, as a memento of their great personal regard to Charles Vignoles, Esq., C.E., under whose able guidance this difficult enterprise has been brought to a completion. After a most satisfactory inspection on the part of the Spanish Government, the line was opened on the first of this month.

ANNUAL CIRCULATION, 10,000.
MURRAY'S HOUSEHOLD ADVERTISER. (Published annually in May.)
Printed for the convenience of Advertisers, for desirous of communicating information to travellers, and inserted in Murray's Hand-books for Travellers, and Railway Time-tables.
This medium of advertising presents peculiar advantages to numerous offices, steam, railway, and other public companies; hotels, inns, and lodging-houses; tradesmen, manufacturers, and indeed, all others, by enabling them to bring under the immediate notice of travellers, and of residents in the country, the various articles they have for sale, or the services they have to offer; the various merits of their mineral waters, manufactures, ointments, pills, medicines, and other articles; and the various means of information as they may desire to make known; while, instead of being lost in the mass of miscellaneous Advertisements which fill the columns of the daily and weekly newspapers, they will form a work of permanent interest and perpetual reference.
Terms for Advertisements, 10s. per inch. Advertisements preferred to have their position in one month subsequent to Number.
Orders for Advertisements, and Bills, &c., to be printed, may be forwarded to the Publisher by the 20th of April, accompanied by a remittance.

COLONEL ROCHEBRUNE.

THE COMMANDER OF THE POLISH ZOUAVES.

WHEN Langiewicz broke up his camp and crossed the Austrian frontier his chief officers accompanied him. But it was not their intention, nor that of their late Dictator, to abandon the struggle. Content with laying hands on Langiewicz, the Austrian authorities appear to have shut their eyes to the presence of his subordinate officers, who at once betook themselves to where their presence seemed of most use to the cause they represented. Some recrossed the frontier at once and continued the struggle in more favourable positions; while Rochebrune, the gallant Colonel of the Polish Zouaves attached to the little army of Langiewicz, took advantage of the transient lull to hurry to Paris, hoping, perhaps, that his representation might be heard in high quarters, certain that among his old comrades he would find many who would accept his invitation to take the field with him against the Russians. Nor have his expectations been disappointed. The latest news from Cracow represents him as being expected there daily, bringing with him from France a good supply of rifles and a number of non-commissioned officers of his old regiment of Zouaves, who, having obtained leave of absence for the purpose, are bent on crossing bayonets with the Russians.

The career of Rochebrune has been, according to a contemporary, a curious one. Having taken part in the Italian campaign and in the expedition to China, he left the French army and accepted an engagement as governor in a Polish family at Cracow. He was here when the insurrection broke out. It was a temptation which the French soldier's nature was ill adapted to withstand. The youth of Cracow were arming openly. Every night bands left to join the insurgents. It was by no means an uncommon thing for a Cracow gentleman, student, or tradesman to take up his rifle, cross the frontier for a fight, and return the same evening to supper. Nay, the story is told that guests at the Cracow inns might be heard instructing the chambermaids to be sure and rouse them in good time in the morning, as a fight might be expected to come off early. Anyhow, at the first sound of firing across the Galician frontier, Rochebrune, with eleven work before him, threw away his books, and, obtaining the help of a few foreigners like himself, organised a band of young men and soon made the Polish Zouaves known and feared wherever fortune gave them the opportunity of coming within reach of the enemy.

His command seems to have become the most popular in Langiewicz's army. It was not, certainly, because he spared himself or his men. His first regiment is said to have been battered to pieces by the fire of the Russian artillery; his second, numbering 450 men, was reduced to a skeleton at the battle of Grochowitza. Rochebrune himself, although he never hesitated to share the perils to which were exposed his devoted followers, has, as yet, escaped unhurt. Should the same good fortune still accompany him, he is likely to be found one of the most active and dangerous of the many gallant men who are preparing to carry something more than sympathy and good wishes to oppressed Poland.

COLONEL ROCHEBRUNE, THE COMMANDER OF THE POLISH ZOUAVES.

WRECK OF THE ORPHEUS.

(From a Correspondent.)

I HASTEN to send you the appalling intelligence of the total wreck of H.M.S. Orpheus on the west coast of New Zealand, with the loss of Commodore Burnett, C.B., twenty-three officers, and one hundred and sixty-six sailors, Royal Marines, and boys, only seventy lives being saved out of a complement mustering 260.

The Orpheus, a new steam-corvette of 21 guns, and 1706 tons, was commissioned at Portsmouth late in the year 1861, for the broad pennant of the Commodore in Australia, and was at Spithead waiting orders when the news of the Trent affair reached England. Commodore Burnett was at once dispatched to convey the Melbourne transport, with a valuable freight of rifles and ammunition, across the Atlantic, and remained on the North American coast, doing good service in directing the disembarking of the "little army" of Canada all through the winter months, when he received orders from the Admiralty to proceed to his command in Australia, arriving in Sydney in July, 1862.

During the detention of the Orpheus in dock, completing a necessary refit and replacing copper torn off in the ice, the Commodore proceeded in the Pioneer to ascertain the most favourable site for a new settlement near Cape York, and to select the most eligible harbour and outlets for the new country recently opened up on the north-eastern shores of Australia. Subsequently, the Commodore proceeded to make the rounds of his station in the Orpheus. Having just returned from a visit to the beautiful colony of Tasmania, he left Sydney for New Zealand on the 31st of January, and, after a very fine passage under canvas, made the land of the Manukau Harbour on the 7th of February.

The harbour of Manukau, situated on the west coast of New Zealand, is but little known. It is a large sheet of water, 100 miles in circumference, formed of innumerable mudbanks, which are dry at low water, intersected by intricate channels, more or less deep. It derives what little importance it has from its position with respect to the capital, Auckland, the two harbours being separated by a narrow neck of land only six miles wide. It has recently come into note as a place for embarking troops, and as a station for men-of-war, when employed against the natives in the Taranaki operations.

A bar, with 30 ft. at top of high water, extends, at a distance of three miles, right across the entrance, inshore of which are large shifting sandbanks, upon which the sea is constantly breaking, with the uninterrupted force of the great Pacific Ocean. Charts of the deep-water channels, compiled from the elaborate surveys of Captain Drury, R.N., are published, to which additions and corrections have been made from time to time by the New Zealand Government. A pilot look-out, with a semaphore signal-station, is in existence near the entrance. Navigators are instructed to pay attention to the signals in their approach through the outworks of shoals and sandbanks, towards the Heads, where they are boarded by the pilot.

As before stated, the Orpheus made the land about eleven a.m., in beautiful, fine, clear weather, with a moderate breeze from the south-west. Soon after was observed the signal-station, with the signal flying, "Take the bar;" the ship being under all plain sail. Steam was got up for half-speed, and she proceeded across the bar, the tide being just on the turn to ebb. Steering by the Admiralty sailing-directions, the pilotage being altered now and then in obedience to the signals, all precautions were taken with the steerage, and to keep the ship under perfect command, keeping, as was thought, in mid channel, making at a good rate for the entrance. It appears that either she was not kept far enough to the northward, or that the middle bank had very recently extended itself unknown to the pilots, for very shortly after passing the bar, and when about two miles from the Heads, at about 1.30 p.m., the ship struck on what was subsequently discovered to be the extreme northern edge of the middle bank, and at about fifty feet from the deep water.

The order was given to back astern, but the engines never moved; the ship immediately broached to, with her head to the north, and the rollers made one complete sweep over the port broadside, tearing to pieces and sweeping everything before them, whilst the heavy bumping of the ship forced up the hatchway fastenings, and she consequently soon filled with water.

All hands were employed lightening the ship of her heavy broadside guns, and getting out the boats.

Just at this time (two o'clock) a small steamer was seen coming out of harbour; but, finding she did not intend to near him, the Commodore dispatched, first of all, a cutter, with the records and valuable papers, and in half an hour another boat, with Lieutenant Hill and Mr. Aimblett, to obtain the services of the life boat at the Head, and to give the alarm to H.M.S. Harrier, known to be in the port.

Mention should here be made of the perfect coolness and judgment of Commodore Burnett, of the discipline and quiet order maintained throughout this trying occasion; and the absolute good feeling displayed by all, from the chief to the smallest boy, speaks well for the service.

With great difficulty, and in imminent danger of swamping in the rollers, the life boats succeeded in reaching the Harrier, and the moment she was on board the pilot, and observed the small steamer Wonga-Wonga, which had a few hours previously left the harbour, approaching the ship from the eastward, and on most with a sense of bewilderment. Of course, the Harrier, with her steam up, could not leave, and no one was prepared to hear of the death of a statesman whose name, while living, was a guide, at least in Parliament, at once of present content and satisfaction and of future hope. It was singular to observe the effect produced on a large body of men of various attainments and diverse opinions by the first announcement on Tuesday afternoon. Men walked with a stealthy pace and spoke with bated breath, and every one who had occasion to present petitions one could detect a gravity of tone and a seriousness of demeanour. The House had not reached the dignity of a House, being far in the majority. At the time Mr. Disraeli entered, his usually immobile countenance, and his unusually quick gait as he walked up the House, betokened excitement. The House was not full, but Lord Palmerston had not arrived. The preliminary business having been disposed of, there was a pause, and then Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Kinglake describes as occurring along the English line the moment before the Russian battle-force began its battle of the Alma. Mr. Walpole, who appeared struck with grief, went behind Mr. Disraeli, whispered a word or two to him, and, receiving a gesture of assent, departed from the House.

At length the Speaker called, in a reluctant voice, on Mr. Buxton, whose business was to put the usual questions. That gentleman rose, but Mr. Walpole waved his hand to him and presented himself to the House. Strange to say, Mr. Walpole, not at once, even then, understood for a time or two, until cries, not loud and distinct, as usual when rival members contend for a hearing, but smothered and subdued, though audible, were heard proceeding from the Irish benches on his seat. Mr. Walpole then rose. This right hon. gentleman has at all times a great command of words and expression, but on this occasion he was objected to him that he was somewhat too profuse in his use of them.

But this time this quality was appropriate, and no one could be said to have spoken in the House, during the time which dictated his mournful accents and his mournful words. While he was speaking, and looking at the Treasury bench, and that of showing their sense of the loss they had sustained, in the high manner in which the late Lord Palmerston had conducted them, and agitated; and when he followed Mr. Walpole, in seconding the motion for the adjournment of the House, his voice was choked with emotion, which he made no effort to conquer, but there were evidently wanting those who believed that if the failure of his speech was, in the result, unfortunate, it was not to be attributed to any physical distress. No man ought to feel, or probably does feel, the loss of Sir George Lewis more than Mr. Gladstone, because, perhaps, more than from the most selfish point of view, for that lamented gentleman was the very keystone of the Ministry, and gave it all the unity and real strength which it possessed. Lord John Russell, when he spoke, held his head bent to his knees and his face buried in his hands, and there was a sadness and solemnity in every sentence of his. Mr. Horsman, which were most impressive. Again, at the close of Lord Palmerston's few broken sentences, which, while they were full of feeling, were rose, and, for the first time in the history of his attempts at mortuary eloquence, was successful. He had had no opportunity for constructing elaborate sentences, and was, in fact, unable to finish those which he felt, neither more nor less, he said what might have been expected from a man who had been all his life a debater, and with something funcreal in their movements, members passed in body from the House, and the sitting was over.

It was a remarkable scene; its very simplicity adding to its intensity and its effect. Perhaps the House might have paid a similar tribute of respect on the death of Mr. Canning, but it could not have while holding so prominent a station in that assembly; but in this instance the tribute was rendered to a statesman whose loss was felt and evinced was not for the Minister, but for the man. Otherwise the motion for adjournment would not have come from a chief man amongst the Opposition, but from a member of the Government, or on a political opponent by a leader of the Conservative party.

The position of Parliament, and the loss which Sir George Lewis was a peculiar one. If we were called upon to signify in a word what was the chief quality of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, we should say that it was with trust. Men believed in his singleness of purpose, his honesty of opinion; in the steady thoughtfulness of his nature, and in the soundness of his judgment. He was a man whose words in the House were uttered for the purpose of conciliating an angry feeling which was not reasonable, or of explaining the intentions of the Government in dealing with the Estimates, and, Sir George Lewis having been a man of peace and economy, his task, however unpleasant was apparent, he did it by a candid agreement with the discontent body in their condemnation of what had occurred, and by expressing, in a manner which was peculiarly his own, the hope that future chicanery would be again attempted. This is scarcely the place to speak of the vast amount of intellect, of intellectual force, and of power of labour, which enabled Sir George Lewis to combine the elements of a high philosophic mind with the knowledge of classical literature, with the practical statesman, the man of business, and the laborious master of details, which made it possible for him to combine the duties of Secretary at War with those of an argumentative, somewhat rhetorical, and at times even a witty, speaker in Parliament, and a diligent student of history, and to expend into fulness he was employed in the public service, in offices which continually demanded, at least in a man of action, capable of shaping affairs in the minutest degree, rather than inclined or prone to the abstract considerations of a speculative theorist, essentially a man of business, and accustomed to deal with matters, Sir George Lewis, by sheer force of labour, became an excellent and effective administrator, and, when he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, a competent Secretary to the Board of Control, an efficient Secretary at the Department of War, and at the Exchequer who surprised everyone by his knowledge of finance, when that knowledge, by his safe and judicious dealing with the fiscal business of the country; and a Minister who, without pretension to genius, but not so easily as not to be well done. Even when he undertook an office the duties of which he discovered, in his modesty as to his accidents, that of Secretary for War, he within a comparatively brief space made himself master of its duties in all their bearings. And this year, in his conduct of the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, he showed that he was once more at home in the discharge of his official duties, and that he was the same safe and able man of business to all parties in the House, and at the confidence in his abilities and knowledge in the House of Commons, that, on his death, it was generally expressed, there can be no doubt that in the next session Mr. Gladstone must have been the leader of the House of Commons, if he did not hold office as a mere name in the cabinet, the office of Prime Minister. It is possible that in the country the value of a statesman of Sir George Lewis's stamp may not have been appreciated so much as it ought; but in Parliament and in the political world it is thoroughly understood that his loss is nearly, if not altogether, irreparable.

For the rest, even if the mournful incident had not stopped the return to business by Parliament, as a mere matter of form, members were as unwilling as schoolboys after their holidays to take to work. Probably everyone was waiting for the Budget, of which hereafter.

The amount required for public works and buildings for 1863-4 is £893,523, being an increase of £201,308 as compared with last year.

The Board of Trade have presented beautiful bronze medals and a reward of £7 to Charles Maddick and William Thompson, master and apprentice of the smack Rusty, of Hull, who so gallantly rescued the crew of the schooner Commodore, of Ipswich, which vessel foundered at sea during a gale in January last.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THURSDAY before the interment of the present generation the House of Commons has shown, in the only mode open to that body, its sense of a shock to its feelings and its sympathies. Twice when manikin traitors did their best to threaten the life of the Queen, and once when the foremost statesman of his time and the greatest member of Parliament that ever lived passed prematurely from the scene he loved so well, the House expressed its inability to proceed with its business and sojourned. This week it has been the sad lot of the House to follow to the grave another painful event. It was known about two o'clock on Tuesday in the precincts of the Palace at Westminster that Sir George Cornewall Lewis was no more. Men started and turned blank faces to each other when the news was first whispered up with all melancholy suddenness, and on most with a sense of bereavement. Of course, the House was not full when the news first passed, and no one was prepared to hear of the death of a statesman who, though he was failing, at least in the House, appeared at once of present content and satisfaction and of future hope. It was singular to observe the effect produced on a large body of men of various attainments and diverse opinions by the first announcement on Tuesday afternoon. Men walked with a stealthy pace and spoke with bated breath, and every one who had occasion to present petitions one could detect a gravity of tone and a seriousness of demeanour. Men believed in his singleness of purpose, his honesty of opinion; in the steady thoughtfulness of his nature, and in the soundness of his judgment. He was a man whose words in the House were uttered for the purpose of conciliating an angry feeling which was not reasonable, or of explaining the intentions of the Government in dealing with the Estimates, and, Sir George Lewis having been a man of peace and economy, his task, however unpleasant was apparent, he did it by a candid agreement with the discontent body in their condemnation of what had occurred, and by expressing, in a manner which was peculiarly his own, the hope that future chicanery would be again attempted. This is scarcely the place to speak of the vast amount of intellect, of intellectual force, and of power of labour, which enabled Sir George Lewis to combine the elements of a high philosophic mind with the knowledge of classical literature, with the practical statesman, the man of business, and the laborious master of details, which made it possible for him to combine the duties of Secretary at War with those of an argumentative, somewhat rhetorical, and at times even a witty, speaker in Parliament, and a diligent student of history, and to expend into fulness he was employed in the public service, in offices which continually demanded, at least in a man of action, capable of shaping affairs in the minutest degree, rather than inclined or prone to the abstract considerations of a speculative theorist, essentially a man of business, and accustomed to deal with matters, Sir George Lewis, by sheer force of labour, became an excellent and effective administrator, and, when he was appointed Chancellor of a competent Secretary to the Board of Control, an efficient Secretary at the Department of War, and at the Exchequer who surprised everyone by his knowledge of finance, when that knowledge, by his safe and judicious dealing with the fiscal business of the country; and a Minister who, without pretension to genius, but not so easily as not to be well done. Even when he undertook an office the duties of which he discovered, in his modesty as to his accidents, that of Secretary for War, he within a comparatively brief space made himself master of its duties in all their bearings. And this year, in his conduct of the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, he showed that he was once more at home in the discharge of his official duties, and that he was the same safe and able man of business to all parties in the House, and at the confidence in his abilities and knowledge in the House of Commons, that, on his death, it was generally expressed, there can be no doubt that in the next session Mr. Gladstone must have been the leader of the House of Commons, if he did not hold office as a mere name in the cabinet, the office of Prime Minister. It is possible that in the country the value of a statesman of Sir George Lewis's stamp may not have been appreciated so much as it ought; but in Parliament and in the political world it is thoroughly understood that his loss is nearly, if not altogether, irreparable.

For the rest, even if the mournful incident had not stopped the return to business by Parliament, as a mere matter of form, members were as unwilling as schoolboys after their holidays to take to work. Probably everyone was waiting for the Budget, of which hereafter.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Ancient Lancs, by D'Arcy W. Thompson (Edinburgh: Edmeston and Douglas). Taste is the predominant characteristic of this exquisite little book, both outside and inside. It is pleasant to the eyes, and its outward and visible pleasantness corresponds well with its inward and intellectual grace. Not only is Mr. Thompson a ripe and good scholar, but he has apparently studied the genuine honeyware. Mnemosyne herself smiled sweetly on his birth, else it were hard to explain the truthfulness with which she has rendered the printed leaves, as well as diction of his originals; for "Ancient Leaves" is a collection of translations, but translations such as are not often met with. And it must not be supposed that the reader will suggest that "Ancient Leaves" will be found withered as well as old; they belong to the evergreen class discovered by Horace, Sophocles, Euripides, and others, and as tenderly has Mr. Thompson dealt with them that they have suffered little, if at all, by the English garment in which he has wrapped them.

The Story of Elizabeth (Smith, Elder, and Co.) Great as was the interest which this story by its own intrinsic merits excited during its career in Fraser's Magazine, there can be no doubt but that it was much heightened by the report which was generally believed that Elizabeth Barrett Browning penned the story of our greatest living satirist. The reprint, in a complete form, does not clear up the question, for no name whatever appears on the "author's place" upon the titlepage; but it will be hard to inform the curious that it is dedicated to the three initials "J. M. T." from the last two of which we are inclined at once to refer the story to a conclusion. As to reading it, we feel disposed to express our feelings by quoting the line—simply requesting that the necessary alteration in the verb may be made, for it is a little too sentimental. It is a homely tale; it is not a triumph of artistic skill or of grammatical accuracy; in fact, the denouement of the story is left to conjecture, and there are rules of poetical justice which are supposed to regulate fiction, nor with the hints towards solution which are here and there suggested. For Sir John had no more right to endeavour to marry Elizabeth, had such an expression as "who had she ever lived for but herself?" is a brilliant solution of the difficulty of English. In conversational passages, "can it be so?" and "You here, John!" Why not me, as well as you?" may be allowed on the ground of colloquialism, but when the author speaks in propriâ personæ, as narrator, or judge, or philosopher, or in any like capacity, the appeal of grammar should, we think, be listened to. The characters in the novel might be taken as a model by many celebrated writers (to their great advantage), and Elizabeth herself is drawn by many an experience which discloses a poetical mind; a tenderness which reaches pathos; a poignancy which is at times bitter when it is pursued by an air youthful freshness and artless innocence which, however appropriate it may be to that rank undergrowth of "sensational" incidents which the feverish appetite of the public demands, is hardly tolerable, wholesome, and exhilarating.

Journey of an Austrian Secretary of Legation at the Court of Czar Peter the Great (2 vols. Bradbury and Evans). The mere fact that this book is the original of which it is a translation, was so distasteful to Peter the Great that he prevented the destruction of as many copies as the Austrian Government could lay hands upon, would be sufficient recommendation to the general notice. But when we add that, according to the evidence of a competent authority, it is full of information which are not to be found anywhere else "touching the life of the Imperial shipwright, we feel sure that we shall raise inclination to see it to the right of avidity. The author of this book was Count Augustin Angel and Invincible Emperor of the Romans, Leopold I., sent on an embassy to the Czar Peter, to announce the accession of the Grand Duke of Muscovy, Peter Alexiowicz, in the year 1698, a noble gentleman called Johann Georg Korb, Baron von Anckirst und Hall, and Johann Georg Korb went in the capacity of Secretary to the Legation. Korb on his return published in slovenly Latin what, being interpreted, is a "Diary of the Journey into Muscovy," to which is added, according to the words of the translation, "The return of his Majesty the Czar from Vienna, and the state of affairs in Muscovy since the dangerous rebellion of the Strelitz, the sentence passed on them, the bloody executions, and the manner of their punishment, with accurate account of Muscovite affairs." Now this work, as we have already mentioned, fell under the displeasure of Peter the Great, and the consequence was that it became extremely scarce. There is a copy in the British Museum; there is one in the Imperial Library at Vienna; there is another in the Ducal Library at Wolfenbüttel, where it is chained (as valuable stuffed animals are under glass), and there are supposed to be four or five other copies scattered about. One of these attracted the attention of Lord MacDonnell, on a sultry summer day during the late Crimean War, as he sought shelter somewhere in the College Library at Petersburg. He discovered it amongst the books left to that library by Henry, Cardinal of York, and Grand Prior of the Order of St. Benedict the Count, "seated day after day in the identical arm-chair in which, so said the living local tradition, fifty years previously, the crownless heir of three kingdoms had sat and read." Lord MacDonnell translated the work for the benefit of our generation. Count MacDonnell's translation has been rendered necessary because it suits the English men, in their own language, many marvellous details of that great (as some men would have called it history, who laid the basis of the foundations of a foreign policy which, whether it aim at universal dominion (as many believe) or not, is certainly gigantic in its views, and is said to be powerful in its day's work through its great persistency, and with a disingenuousness of conduct resulting, no doubt, from that same persistency. Count Augustin and perjury for Korb declares the Muscovite remarkable.

Leaves from a Journal; or, Extracts from the Journal of the Hon. Josiphine Gubington (Murray). Twenty-three caricatures, accompanied by humorous letterpress, make up the contents of this handsome volume. The Hon. Josiphine is a lady who occupies a goose in a pork-pie hat, is, we suppose, a type of those ladies who visit travel abroad in order to travel, and who, when they visit Rome wear costumes which they have no business (in those latitudes) to wear; who will go to Switzerland in the month of May, and, according to physiognomy, as romance suggests, and not by the advice of friends, as common sense would dictate; and who come to grief after a fashion of which the pictures are an exaggeration. The title is, of course, a parody of that adopted by Lord Dufferin in his own quiet, delightful way. The book is by pencil and pen, and a few degrees above those which might be found in a private sketch-book; and the fact that they are the work of a lady not only of hereditary genius but of title by marriage also will, no doubt, recommend them for drawing-room display. The same fact will, we hope, plead successfully for the author's being allowed to consider a few of the scenes broad, if not slightly indelicate, and not to make a conscientious objection to the publication of "Leaves from a Journal."

Reminiscences of Thirty Years' Residence in New South Wales and Victoria, &c. (Sampson Low, Son, and Co.) This is not a book by a competent authority upon a subject of great importance to all of us be a thing to be desired we here have it. Australian history, past and present, is a thing to be known by Englishmen. Transportation and the ticket-of-leave system nearly concern all who have to do with the Colonies, and we have the general knowledge of knowing friends who have been subjected to that process, and for thirty years Mr. Thurvy has been living there, and apparently becoming acquainted with the history and observing the effects of the systems. For, during that period of thirty years, he filled successively the offices of Clerk to the Attorney-General, Judge of Port Phillip, and Judge of the Supreme Court of New South Wales. Mr. Thurvy has been deeply interested in the matter by giving personal sketches of some of those more notorious convicts whose names have found their way into the newspapers of late as the fame of the greatest heroes. Amongst these is conspicuous the gentle Quaker Tawell, opposite to whom Mr. Thurvy had once the happiness and distinction of living. We would willingly, were it possible, give extracts relating to all those (in) famous gentry; but definite space will not hold an indefinite quantity of matter, and we must therefore content ourselves with referring the reader to the book itself for information which is both curious and important, and for Mr. Thurvy's own opinions upon emigration, transportation, sheepwalks, gold-diggings, and other matters, in number as the sand upon the seashore.

FINE ARTS.

THE EXHIBITION AT THE FRENCH GALLERY.

The exhibition of works by foreign artists, just opened at the so-called French Gallery, Pall-mall, consists of a large proportion of Belgian, German, Dutch, and Danish works than in any previous year. The French school is still well represented, but the International Exhibition probably prepared the way for the many contributions from our last immediate neighbours on the Continent. As a whole, however, the collection is less numerous than usual, but it contains fewer small unimportant works.

The great advantage of the exhibitors in this gallery is that they afford opportunities that should never be neglected, of comparing Continental with English art. The conclusion forced upon us by these comparisons, and especially by the present selection, is, that on the whole, all they are remarkably free from the tendency to exaggeration of various kinds and the vulgarity so painfully prevalent in our public exhibitions. A certain class of French "boudoir art" is very objectionable; but, contrary to what our ardent reformers would lead us to expect, it exists in very small quantities. The painters abroad evince as genuine a love of nature as we find at home. On the whole, therefore, we must conclude that the Parisian public, like all young painters to complete their artistic education in the atelier of a master, is not adopted here. Several artists who live at Rome, Venice, Bruges, and the centres of minor schools has culminated through the system of making the acquirements of one generation the vantage ground for the next.

One great Continental artist supplies, however, an apparent—but only an apparent—exception to the rule. This is Meissonier, a master, who contributes the largest and (for its singularity) most remarkable picture in this gallery. He has chosen a subject that reproduce the art of Memling and Holbein at the same time that he attempts to depict an incident from the every-day life of France at the beginning of the sixteenth century. M. Leys has, to a very great extent, really done in relation to the Netherlandish painters of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries what, from his style, we might have expected from, but has not been attempted by, the modern pre-Raphaelites in relation to the early Italian masters. But, not bringing accurate as are the reflexes of early Flemish art in all the works of Leys, undoubted as is the influence of Memling on the early Belgian painter—when compared with M. Gallait, Paul Delaroche, and some other historical painters—has paid a penalty for seeking to revive the natural order of progress. Antiquarianism, as it was in M. Leys, not content with the legitimate employment of antiquarian research in correctness in costumes and accessories, has gone so far to the extent of actually reproducing the ignoble types of face almost invariably found in the productions of the early Dutch art. Hence, in this series of pictures there are two grave objections—first, it is nature at third hand; secondly, it is the reproduction of, in all probability, very imperfect representations of the grotesque features, the coarseness, and the exaggeration of character to the verge of caricature are found in the early art; but the positive approximation to nature in the early Northern schools indicates the want of that sense of dignity and beauty which is the glory of contemporary Italian art. Having defended, on what, in accordance with the principles of criticism of which the exhibition of any work by this eminent painter naturally leads, we may consider as the few remarks we have to make on his picture, we come to description. The subject of the present picture is the Archduke Charles (afterwards Charles V.), before his "Joyous Entry" into the city of Antwerp (then the chief city of the marquisate of the Holy Empire), taking the oath to observe the existing laws and respect the privileges of the future subjects—an oath by no means unfrequently taken by the Emperor, his lieutenants, and successors. All the principal figures are grouped (high up in the picture) upon an elevated platform, erected for the occasion, in the centre of which is an altar-table, supporting a crucifix, with the sacred Bible, open. Behind this young Archduke—then fourteen years old, and who stands with his hand on the New Testament—is his aunt Marguerite d'Autriche, "gouvernante" of the Netherlands, and seated on each side of her are her sisters, the Princesses Eleanor and Marie, subsequently Queens of France and Hungary. The magistracy, left of the picture, are followed by the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal suite. Inclining towards the Archduke is the Burgomast r Jean Van Immerseele, who, on the right are other dignitaries (religious, civil, and military) of Antwerp, and white-robed assessors of the Abbot of St. Michael, one bearing the mitre, another the crozier, all assisting at this solemn ceremony. The whole of the upper part is very fine in colour: the kneeling figures keep their place well, and the drawing is excellent. The heads have extraordinary character. Nevertheless, few, except the pale and unsympathetic head of the Burgomaster, and the scant-looking young Court lady, seem studied directly from nature, or, at all events, from the nature selected by other living Belgian painters, not followers of the same antiquarian crotchets. The whole of the lowest third of the picture is occupied by steps, up which, in half a carpet, and in front of the altar, are two of Eyck's pictures; and two seated heralds, conceived in the taste of the Flemish illuminators, the darker one bearing the shield of the arms of Spain, the other a similar shield of the simple, municipal arms of Antwerp. That the most important space in the picture should be occupied by a great fault in the composition is, however, if the theory of Leys were consistently worked out, the very threads of the carpet should be rendered as they are by Van Eyck, and one of the heralds finished with the careful "stippled" precision of Memling or Mabuse, which they certainly are not. The picture, which is one out of six (the series to be purchased for, we believe, £10,000, by Mr. Gambart, the enterprising director of this gallery), from which frescoes commissioned by the Belgian Government will be painted in the Townhall, Antwerp. The influence of Leys is seen in Leyens's "Voyage de Noces," in the Belgian Gallery, but it is not to be found of higher power, interest, and suggestiveness by Dasot, a Belgian artist, formerly pupil of Flandrin and Lamothe, in "Dante in Hades or Death," "Young Luther at Church," and "Faust and Marguerite in the Garden." In the last, however, the figure of Faust is most unpainly, and the German character is lost by the introduction of a view of picturesque housetops, which seems borrowed bodily from one of M. Leys's backgrounds of sixteenth century Dutch towns. Faust is a lugubrious repetition, with no new element, of the oft-recurring Dutten Leys of the fifteenth century.

Other eminent Belgian painters are represented. Alfred Stevens whose single-figure subjects were unsurpassed in the International Exhibition for perfection of workmanship, has contributed three ladies at a low window, one seated without, containing fine passages of tone and tender colour. Wappers, also, contributes a single, charmingly imitated, but, on the whole, not up to his usual level. He sends two pictures, founded on the period when the Netherlands were under the dominion of Spain, one representing a young hidalgo seeking an introduction to that one of two young Flemish ladies who seems to turn her back on him, and a similar Spanish gallant proposing to another fair and half-frightened Flamande. The painting has a considerable look of the school of Terburg and Netscher; it is rather fat and poor, and the figures are wanting in vitality to the same class belong the works of Knarren (in one of whose pictures the chairs are painted certainly not meagre) and De Noter. Madou, the Belgian Wilkie, has a "Gipsy Telling Fortunes in the Guard-room," good in character but poor in colour. Dillens, whose "Winter in Zealand" we engraved from the International Exhibition, has a well-painted picture of an archery meeting, the costumes in which are of the same locality. Koller's "Church Porch" contains some very admirable painting, though rather black in tone, and there are examples of De Block, Verschuy, and Verboeckhoven. The Dutch painters Springer (whose architectural subjects are always excellent), Van Lier, and Van Hove, are also exemplified. From German painters we have "The Village Politicians," an (apparently rather early work, by Knaus—rather vigorous but inclining to caricature; and a beautiful picture of "The Bay of Naples," full of enforced sunlight, by the younger (Oswald) Achenbach. The Danish school is represented by Sorenson, who paints the sea in movement as we never saw it painted; and Mdme. Jerichau, the wife of the distinguished Danish sculptor.

The most important French work is a picture by the deceased painter, Decamps, "Turkish and Appraisers" represents a party of monkeys inspecting a landscape. It is said that this picture was painted in revenge for the rejection by the jury of the exhibition of this very picture under similar circumstances, and that the apes were identified as members of the jury. The old satirist sat very with his room shade, perhaps with a magnifying-glass into the landscape instead of viewing it at the proper distance, was recognised as a portrait of Horace Vernet, one of the leading classical academicians, who opposed the innovations of Decamps and the Romanticists. The character and satirical humour displayed in it are extraordinary: but the "quality," as it is technically termed, of the execution, is unenviable. By "painting up" from a dark ground, and by plentiful glazing and varnishing, the modern artist has lost the texture, the jewelled richness and depth of an old painting, and yet not lost the smoothness and opacity of a modern production.

By Meissonier there is a picture, "The Etcher," marvellous for its minute and microscopic finish of elaborate accessories. Colour is the chief deficiency of Knipser. Plassan is pleasing and rich, but rather monotonous in his shadows.

Edouard Frère is even more than usually felicitous in "The Arrival of the Child," a family group in a village cottage, surrounding the contents of a basket, given to solace him on leaving home, to a bigger boy; a boy possibly not above suspicion of a gluttonous capacity that may result either in calomel or gingerbread for the little new comer. The amenities of school-life are illustrated by the inexpient fight in the background. Such a subject ten years ago would have been rendered repugnant; here the unforced naturalness redeems it from this most objectionable fault. The head of the boy carrying home the early morning light is given with great truth in another picture by Frère, of "Breakfast-time in the Farm." Duverger is very near Frère in the subject, "Going to the Village School," but Jerome contributes a picture, "Camels at the Fountain," which, giving no hope for the future of the painter, is perfect in its present state. "The Duel after the Masquerade," and many well-known subjects from classical history by Jerome, are absent. Gerome has a fine picture in colouring of this artist more apparent. By Robert-Fleury there is a large important picture representing a procession—half religious, half military—in honour of Pius IX. The heads, the expressive faces of the popular troubles, the victims of the plague, of fanaticism, and of Inquisitorial tortures, by this artist, Paul Delaroche, Troyon has never surpassed, for truth of cold daylight breaking through mountain mists, in a picture he sends, his "Paturages Bords." Mdlle. Rosa Bonheur does not contribute a full-grown Bonheur has a remarkably luminous landscape, with cattle and sheep. Yvon contributes a picture of Napoleon I. and an equestrian scape, by Lambinet: richly-painted groups of large-horses, by Veyrassat, and Meissonier's "Napoleon I. in 1814," a picture, in finely-toned interior by Lungee: "Henri III. and his Minions the Evening before his Murder," by Grenier de St. Martin—which, with better colour, would be of very considerable merit; and several cleverly-painted works by Henri Schlesinger.

The trustees of the National Gallery, having come into possession of the £10,000 bequeathed by Mr. Lewis, have, we understand, decided to devote the whole of it to the purchase, generally for the good of the collection. By his will Mr. Lewis left a portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds of Lord Heathfield, the defender of Gibraltar, a favourite of George IV., to the nation, and, on condition of its acceptance and proper preservation, he bequeathed the handsome sum named. There was a picture by Reynolds exhibited at the Manchester Exhibition of English works were the English portion of the Angerstein Collection, bought as long back as 1824. Last year, however, as many as five important Reynolds were purchased for the nation, the best portrait of Mrs. Siddons (perhaps Gainsborough's finest masterpiece), purchased at the sale of Mr. Fuller Maitland's pictures; the "Infant Bacchanalian" (£1000), by the same fascinating painter; the famous "Children as Cupids" (£2,100), from the Northbrook collection; and a rivalry of Paul Potter's "Bull," at the Hague, and, we think, the finer of the two; "Mousehold Heath" (£420), the very fine example of Old Crome, which was in the Bicknell collection, and a work by Reynolds (£210). This will justify living artists in hoping that the National Gallery may yet be fitted to receive a modern collection. I shall shortly offer our readers an Engraving from Gainsborough's exquisite picture of Mr. Fitzherbert.

Mr. Frith, R.A., has been released from his engagement to paint three pictures for Mr. Gambart, of Morning, Noon, and Night in London. He has undertaken to paint a picture of the wedding of the Prince and Princess of Wales for her Majesty. Mr. Filmer (who commissioned the "Railway Station"), has purchased the copyright of the Royal wedding picture (intended for under-stand, a replica of the painting) for 5000 guineas. We have heard, also, that Mr. Gambart has had this, large as the amount, is the actual sum to be paid to the artist.

The reduced copy which we announced would be made by the artist who painted Mrs. Princess of Wales, for the Prince of Wales, has been, by permission of her Majesty, executed for the Art-Union of London, and will be a present to subscribers. Moreover PEASANTS OF PODOLIA.

PEASANTS OF THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF CRACOW.

As regards Austria, we learn that in her mode of governing her Polish provinces she seems at present to steer halfway between the Russian and Prussian systems. In spite of recent reforms—in spite of liberty of the press almost as great as in Prussia, and perfect liberty of speech in the Galician Diet—there is still, on the whole, far less political liberty in Galicia than in Posen; though, of course, far more than in the Russian provinces, where there is none at all. On the other hand, of that kind of freedom scarcely appreciable by those who have never felt the want of it, which consists in being able to speak, learn, teach, and transact all kinds of business in the national language and without the interposition of foreigners, there is less in Austrian Poland than in that portion of Russian Poland called "the kingdom," where every one speaks Polish; where Polish money circulates, and accounts are kept in the old Polish currency; where such phantoms of journals as appear are all printed in Polish; where Polish is the language of the public offices, churches, and schools; and where, until quite lately, when in consequence of the Poles refusing to attend, it was closed, there was a national Polish theatre, at which Polish pieces were played by Polish actors.

With this summing up of what may be called the political part of the subject, we leave these volumes, only adding that in them will also be found much illustration of the history of Poland, her political institutions, and her social life, past and present; and, generally, we think that the work is a valuable contribution towards the elucidation of a question which now occupies so large a share of the attention of the world.

From the numerous pictorial illustrations with which these volumes are interspersed, we have engraved three in our Journal of this week—namely, "The Vaults of the Cathedral of Cracow"—the burial-place of Kosciusko, Sobieski, and Poniatowski: a picture of "Peasants of the Neighbourhood of Cracow;" and another of "Peasants of Podolia."

THE NEW PARISIAN TERMINUS OF THE NORTHERN RAILWAY OF FRANCE.

THE entrance to Paris by the Northern Railway station has not hitherto impressed the traveller favourably. Although not ill chosen as to site, the old Embarcadère du Chemin de Fer du Nord has long been looked upon almost as an eyesore on account of the difficulty of access to it, and the state of delay into which it has fallen. This was partly owing to the great increase in the passenger and goods traffic, an idea of the extent of which may be gathered from the fact that this line transported, in 1861, 8,479,885 passengers and 2,542,402 tons of merchandize. As the direct means of communication between London and Paris, and other parts of the Continent via Belgium, this line cannot fail to continue its career of prosperity; and, although several new branches have been added of late years, the mileage, contrary to the general experience of other lines, and especially of British railways, has materially increased. Nearly all the French railways pay good dividends—some even more than the Northern; but the prestige surrounding the family of the Rothschilds, many of whose members take an active part in the administration and direction of this important line, renders it a very favourite investment.

The comfort of travellers by this railway is especially studied; tickets and information may be procured at bureaux established in all parts of the capital, at which omnibuses call at stated times to convey passengers and their luggage to the stations, returning thence to their respective quarters with fresh arrivals. Owing to the great extension of the business on the northern line, its council of administration, consulting the interests of the shareholders as well as the convenience of the public, decided upon erecting a new terminus near the site of the old one, but opening out upon one of those immense avenues which Paris is now being constructed.

The plan of the new Parisian railway-station, of which we give an Engraving, presents a quadrilateral of about 180 × 200 yards, thus comprising a superficies of 34,000 yards. It includes five principal parts, as indicated by the facade—namely, a grand hall, on the right of the Engraving, the salles de départ, followed by what we may call the station proper, where the tickets are distributed; and on the left the salles d'arrivée, and covered accommodation for the vehicles in waiting. In the inferior are nine lines of rail, separated by four large and six smaller platforms. The building composing the facade comprises the Salon Impérial with its accompaniments, the post and telegraph offices, the bureaux of the station-masters, and waiting-rooms for the convenience of the passengers of the first class, raised over the hall give it a very characteristic appearance, and is a fresh proof of the progress made in covering extensive surfaces with airy and elegant. The architecture of this new embarcadère is as unpretending as it is graceful; a large entrance crowns the centre of the facade, which is decorated with eight pilasters, rising 47 by 7 by 7 by 7

THE THEATRES.

NEW ADELPHI.—In a new farce produced at this house Mr. J. L. Toole has an original character, which almost entirely depends on his ingenuity or humour. The piece is entitled "The Trial of Tompkins," and is an adaptation by Mr. T. J. Williams of a French drama by MM. Adrien Decourcelle and Jules Adenis, called "Le Meilleur des Fères." Tompkins undergoes the trial, in the course of which he makes an effective speech, in which the prisoner, Sharpshins a love affair, in which he gets wounded. Mr. Pepys (Mr. Sharpshins (Mr. Bedford) is determined to test his future son-in-law to the utmost, but confides his plans to a written document for his own guidance. Tompkins gets sight of the manuscript programme, and is accordingly forearmed. By means of bluster he assumes an air of courage which, in the first instance, answers well enough, and Pepys's document is thrown aside. Tompkins has a rival in one Henry Mowbray (Mr. Sefton), who leads real pistols with real balls, and Pepys, who is not prepared to encounter such desperate men, has pretended valour at once evaporates, and he surrenders the lady without further struggle. The versatility displayed by Mr. Toole in connection with the character hardly exhibit his powers to the full, as the effect which this actor produces depends upon the minutest accessories. The old Gentlemen of Verona," in which he accompanies himself on the piano, producing a series of trills and arpeggios with the greatest gravity and perfect sang-froid. Next he appears as a sailor, to sing the extremely risky drinking song of "The Mermaid;" and then as Mr. Jenkins, a poor journalist, with the manuscript of a sensational drama, called "The Mysterious Malediction"—the composition, we understand, of Mr. James Bruton. The reading of the drama proved to be a triumph, and we feel sure the success of the entertainment will mainly depend on the merits of this very effective interlude. "A Story Without an End." A variety of dramatic characters, both male and female, then attends Mr. Fisher abundant opportunities of showing his versatile powers. The principal characters in this production are supplied by the musical talents of Miss Kate Mellon and Miss Sarah Lonnen. The former has been specially engaged, and is well fitted up. Mr. Fisher is a curiously-accomplished man; and, altogether, the public will be surprised at his entertainment. He also presents points of novelty, over and over and above, possesses a charm which was as little to be expected as it is to be described.

We are happy to find that Mr. W. S. Woodin is progressing prosperously with his entertainment in Edinburgh. His appearance at the Waterloo Rooms on Monday week commanded a crowded and appreciative audience. The journals inform us that since his last visit he has changed his line of characters, and now portrays the social habits of the country during the four seasons of the year. They much approve of his personation of Lord Dundreary, and commend generally his performance to the attention of the Edinburgh public.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Fourth Newmarket Biennial showed us Harlequin in the same form as when he won that desperate, winning race with Carbineer over the B. C. last year, and Chaswell again secured the five pee cents for third; but the finest race of the meeting was that in which Sam Kenyon, on Melwood, caught Brother to Morocco in the last stride, and silenced all the Cassidia cavils. The 2000-guinea Zetland made his own event good, and was easily beaten in the Chester Plate between and Clarisimum, second and third for the St. Leger; while Stradella was the best of the rest on her own mark, and, easily receiving 7lb. for sex, to deprive The Marquis cleverly of the Fort. Except in the Derby, this is the only time that Mr. Hawke's horse has been beaten, and those who watched the performance thought that he showed a white feather. Such a finish as the St. Leger requires a deal of forgetting, and, with such cattle as Stradella, The Whaffler, and Harlequin, his chance of Cup honours seems small indeed. Brown Duchess finished her racing career with this week; and it is curious, as we look over the winners of the three great events, that since West Australian, from infirmity of legs or throat, none of them, save Thormanby, have been able to win any of the three great Cup races of the year.

With Mr. Burton up once more, Bridegroom has won the Liverpool Hunt Club Steeplechase in his old style, in the presence of the veritable "Lord Dundreary." At Thirsk the Mowbray Stakes was a hard-and-fast affair between three: and two Colsterdales, one of them bred by the late Sir Tatton Sykes, were winners on the first day. Rapprare has been sold to the stud for a thousand; and a most fashionable attempt to make August by some sort a Derby and the stable by an unlooked window, has, thanks to the horse's plunging, signally failed, although the wound was fully four inches deep.

Six steeplechase meetings are set down for next week: but, save Newcastle Spring, there is nothing of importance in the April programme. So far there are scarcely any matches on the list, and Lord William Fowler, seeing what form Asteroid is in, has wisely determined to sell out. Tim Whiffler at once was weighed against him for The Whip, but to wait till the Ascot Cup, where he receives 9lb. from him for his Derby. With the exception of the Derby, Asteroid is, in which Tim Whiffler carries 7lb. extra—putting him at even weights with Donovan and the Two-year-old Phaleron. The Derby was an interesting race on paper at Newmarket except the Two and One Thousand. For the former Hospodar, Saccharometer, Blue Mantle, Rapid Rhone, and Merman, are likely to be the principal runners, and general opinion seems quite to point to Hospodar and Blue Mantle for first and second. Donovan, Carnage, Sandia, Cadenza, and Merman are the principal winners among "the ladies' lot."

Meanwhile, London ought to be great scullers' match on Tuesday, when the winning-gun sounded. Chambers's forty-third victory. This is the third time he has successfully rowed for the championship of the Thames. He first performed the feat originally, and was born in 1832, two years before Everson, and is 5 ft. 10 in. by 11 st. 4 lb. Peter Craven he took the stream, as usual, with a spurt of his tremendous strokes, put his opponent in difficulties. At the Crabtree he led by a couple of lengths, and all was over; and Everson, who rowed a very game stern chase, troubled on every side from the wash of that chartered nuisance the steamers, was beaten by several boats' lengths. The time was 20 min. 14 sec., and the victor was met with expectation as to the meeting of Chambers and Green, the Australian champion. The latter has stated £50 a-side, and a deal will most probably come off in May.

Mr. Arthur Coventry, the celebrated M.F.H., died very suddenly on Easter Sunday, at his home, Snydale Hall, near Pontefract, in his seventy-first year. It is nearly fifty years since he succeeded Sir Bellingham Graham with the Badsworth, which he has since had to take the Holderness country, with Will Danby as his first whip and hound breeder. He also had over a few days—a new country could be worked on such a pittance as £800, and now 30 couple of hounds are kept. Mr. Coventry hunted the Holderness himself, as he held for two seasons (1830-41), was not his sphere; but still he showed some excellent sport with his "lady pack" of 29 couples, which were kept for 1000 gs. to Lord Downe. Soon after these, principally through Mr. Foljambe's interest, and the remembrance of what sport he had shown under difficulties in Holderness, he was appointed to the West Riding registrarship of deeds, after a severe contest with one of the Lascelles family. In Yorkshire he was very popular, and quite looked to as a Nestor on hunting matters, which no one understood more thoroughly. He kept a broad mare, Eclogue by Emilius, and trained two or three of her stock, one of which, Virginius, showed some good form; and to the last, when other duties did not call him away, the well-known great figure and white hat would be seen at the cover-side on his pony or in a four-wheel. Like Sir Tatton and Mr. Gully, he was one of that rare old school of sportsmen we are very loth to lose.

The season with her Majesty's staghounds closed yesterday (Friday). Mr. Davis scarcely recollects a finer succession of good runs, and the hounds have only once been stopped by the frost. They had their annual Stoner Derby day in Oxfordshire on Friday (April 10), and the deer Cranwell, the same that was uncarted there last year, swam the Thames three times, and was finally taken some three miles from Oxford. The Easter Monday run with Lilly conquered two hours, and was the best of the season. Between Ascot and Windsor, Richmond, Punch, and Harry—are still going well in their several and eighth seasons; and The Dane and Volunteer have proved excellent performers.

The French journals speak very rapturously of the Duke of Beaufort's hunting turnout; but the Duke's stables are divided as to their chance with the wolves. The only accounts we have are that they had found some feces and a fine mane with them. We understand that the first whip is to hunt the Blackmore Vale hounds next season.

The Sporting Magazine illustrates its annual list of sires with a portrait of Dagobert, after R. Corbet; and Bailey's has the Hon. Mr. Pomeroy, M.F.H., on a grey cob over the moulds. Both have issued their wonted black and red sides-de-camp in the shape of Ruff and Bailey's Turf Guide.

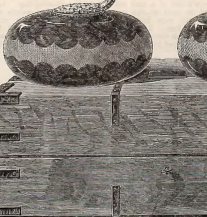
THE FARM.

The Dublin Spring Shows, where the older bulls quite surpassed their seniors, started most extra well. Never was the renewed presence of cracks from the other side of the Channel, as in the days when Rosette used to take her annual trip, or Master Butterfly had his tremendously protracted contest with Douglas's Captain Balco. Out of the 167 shorthorn entries only 41 were from beyond the sea, but their quality was most deficient one we have had for many years,' and estimates the actual deficiency at fully one-third of the average of the five and a half million quarters, with the only set-off in the increased breadth of wheat grown in 1862. The crop of barley was better than that of wheat, but still hardly an average. Oats were of extraordinary productiveness, "the best crop for many years;" and as regards beans and peas, considering that amateur cultivators are recently given to overcropping, there seems little to complain of. The "bottle sheaves" of America do not seem likely to produce so much serious inconvenience this year, and, notwithstanding the upward loss, the shippers have made a good profit on their enormous consignments of about eleven million quarters last year.

The anomaly is thus explained :—"Suppose the price of flour 30s. per barrel in New York, and wheat 6s. in London: the New York merchant pays for it in green-backs, which are at least at 60 per cent discount; he receives for it in London, at the present rate, 30s. in green-backs, and this pays him a good profit after all expenses of freight are deducted."

A case at the Leicester Sessions will, it is hoped, serve to warn farm servants and others against giving arsenic to their horses to make them fine in their coats. Here the man had got hold of some which remained after dressing the wheat, and five horses died from its effects. As there was, however, not the slightest evidence of a malicious intention or any premeditation of the practice by the prisoner from the lad who helped him, he was very properly acquitted, with a severe reprimand from the vice-chairman, Sir Frederick Fowke.



PAIR OF CURLING STONES PRESENTED TO H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.

SKATING-RINK AT MONTREAL.

OUR Engraving of the Victoria skating-rink at Montreal shows how the Canadian country relieves the tedium of a winter that, beginning early in December, extends to the end of April. As the heavy falls of snow to a great extent preclude skating in the open air, that enjoyment is likewise carried on in buildings erected for the purpose, and which become a fashionable resort for both ladies and gentlemen. The building which our Artist has selected to illustrate this Canadian custom is one of the best of its kind. It is 250 ft. long by 100 ft. broad. The roof is supported by unincumbered, double roof, 50 ft. in height, which, springing from the ground, is so constructed as to give an apparent lightness of effect combined with great strength. The space adopted for skating is surrounded by a promenade, with a raised recess on one side for the band, while commodious dressing and cloak rooms are attached. At night the building is well lighted with gas, and, with many hundreds of persons gliding through all the mazy evolutions that skaters delight in, the scene presented to the spectator is striking in the extreme. Messrs. Lawford and Nelson, of Montreal, were the architects of this building.

CELEBRATION OF THE ROYAL WEDDING DAY ON THE ICE OF BURLINGTON BAY, LAKE ONTARIO, CANADA WEST.

In the dominions upon which the sun never sets the manner of celebrating the wedding day of the Prince of Wales was frequent by every variety of climate. The great and last of the ice races for the season of 1891-92 was held on the last day of May, and was run on Burlington Bay, near Hamilton City, as also the frozen surface of the bay in front of the city of Toronto, with social life and gaiety in consequence for the day. Thus the Queen's son-in-law Prince of England and the Royal Lady of Denmark. The citizens of Hamilton and Toronto, as also the surrounding country, from Lake Erie and Simcoe, Catherine's, near Niagara frontier; of London—happy, thriving, Canadian London—and from the Grand River, thirty miles southwest: with the Red Indians of the Tuscarora district, flocked to the spot. Guelph and Galt, also, two wonderful little towns springing out of nothing into the wide proportions of streets, squares, and the commercial and manufacturing activities of large cities, with houses, and wigwams for that joyous day. And though all had military parades of militia, volunteers, and other attractions of their own, many of their people mounted their sleighs, cutters, carioles, and, to the tuning of the jingling bells and harness of their fast-trotting horses, made tracks, scouring, careering over river, over lake, through forests, and over hill and snow, to be present at the ice-boat and ice-race meeting, in front of Hamilton.

Nor were these all. The horses to be trotted in harness, as seen in the Engraving, were animals whose breed had sounded far beyond Canada. Some were natives of the State of New York, and some of the State of Michigan. Their names belong to the sporting history of America, and their genealogy to the studs of England. Remarkable horses attracted notable men. Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence, in "York State," was present to befriend our frontier. The railways brought them from Milwaukie, in the State of Wisconsin; from Chicago, in Illinois; from Detroit, in Michigan; from Cleveland, in Ohio, and in the State of Ohio. Some came to see what the horses of Canada were like, that they might purchase or make their own stock of the "trade off" their own horses; and some had skeddaddled, not intending to be "in home" until the end of June.

The different bodies of volunteer militia paraded in the forenoon: rifle volunteers, artillery volunteers, Wentworth cavalry (so called from the name of the county), the Governor-General's Body Guard, Alexander Russell, commanding the British regulars of the garrison, gave the 1st battalion of H.R.H. 60th rifles brigade a holiday for the sight of the volunteers; but the battery of Royal Artillery turned out, with their Armstrong guns and their gunpowder smoke, and the Canadian Artillery came sleighing over the ice from St. John, New Brunswick, into Canada, in the winter of apprehended trouble, 1861-2. They made their way to the mountain, and from the top fired a Royal salute at noon, at which time of day the sun was in the meridian of Burlington Bay.

No other part of British America is so thoroughly English in nomenclature of places as the country round Burlington Bay, which was laid out on the 10th of March. The bay itself bears a Yorkshire name, to begin with. The people in thousands—the ice being twelve to fourteen inches thick, and deemed strong enough to bear any number of vehicles, horses, and people—came from Flamborough, from Grimsby, from Saltfleet, from the county of Welland, from the county of Lincoln, and from many other places bearing such fine old English names.

The workshops of the Great Western Railway of Canada at Hamilton and London, and of the Grand Trunk and Northern at Toronto, Kingston, Belleville, and Montreal, were closed for the day; thereby giving about three thousand mechanics a holiday, excepting only those necessary to work the traffic of the lines; as traffic, be it

CURLING STONES

PRESENTED TO THE PRINCE OF WALES BY THE ROYAL CALEDONIAN CURLING CLUB.

At the annual meeting of the Representative Committee of the Royal Caledonian Curling Club, held in Glasgow last July, it was announced that the Prince of Wales had signified, through the Earl of Mansfield, his acceptance of the office of patron of the club, formerly held by his illustrious and lamented father the Prince Consort. At the same meeting it was resolved to present the Prince of Wales with a pair of curling stones, which his Royal Highness has graciously accepted. They are made of green serpentine, found near Crieff, Perthshire, and generally known to curlers by the name of Moffat stone. The handle, the knob of which is of oak from Linlithgow Palace, are richly mounted in silver. The plates, which screw on to the stone, are elaborately chased with thistles, forming shields in the centre, which bear the following inscription:—"Presented by the Royal Caledonian Curling Club to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, Patron, 1863." They have been designed and executed by Mackay, Cunningham, and Co., goldsmiths, and to the Queen, Prince's-street, Edinburgh.

remarked in passing, chiefly coming from the Western American States towards the seaboard at New York, Boston, and Portland.

To return to the races, little need be said of how "Tow Boy," of St. Catherine's, beat the crack trotter from Buffalo by a head; nor of how knowing ones came from long distances expecting to bet with the English aristocracy of the ride brigade—"rich fellows, good at paying up"—and make a purse, but who betted and did not make a purse; a race on the ice not being always to the swiftest, nor to the strongest, but generally to the spanking trotter that can best remain on its feet, and carry the light, the airy, fairy cutter, and the fast youth perched on the crow's-nest of a seat safely past the winning-flag. Little more need be said of the races than that many people were very cold, yet very happy, while some pocketed the money which others lost. I prefer to say something of the bay, on the ice of which the races were trotted off. Already its shores are covered with squared logs of white oak and elm brought down from distances of one to two hundred miles by railway. These are now in process of being built into drams; six of the drams are put together to form a raft, the rafts are towed by steam-tugs from here, the head of Lake Ontario, to Kingston, lower end of the lake, whence they float on the river stream to Prescott, at the head of the rapids. There the rafts are taken to pieces, and run the rapids in single drams of about a hundred squared logs each. Below Montreal they are again put together as a raft, and so float on to Quebec.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1200.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1863. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE BUDGET.

THE Minister of Finance of England has very nearly placed himself in that position which has been said to be one of special danger, for all men speak well of him just now. Everyone knows that while delivering those spoken State papers which are known by the name of Budgets Mr. Gladstone carries away his audience, and that the most watchful and incredulous of his predetermined critics sit enchanted into admiration beneath the wand of the magician. Each word that he speaks is a pleasant promise to the ear; every sentence is pregnant of future golden fruition; and, truth to say, so completely have members of the House of Commons been enthralled by the art of the rhetorician, that they have begun of late to draw a distinction in their own minds between his facts and his speeches, and they assemble to enjoy an agreeable evening with him, but with a predetermination to suspend their judgment until the next morning. While they hear him they are ready to take all that he utters for granted; but every man is under the influence of a mental reservation to read carefully the chronicle of that to which they have listened before they pledge themselves to the acceptance of its subject-matter. It was, probably, in some such vein and temper that the soi-disant guardians of the public purse came down this year to receive the annual account from their steward. Rumour had, as usual, been busy with Mr. Gladstone's projects; and there was a notion abroad that he was about to be more fantastical than ever, and that the national finances were about to pass through a process of experiments which would be as nearly crucial as he could make them. Those who expected a Budget of surprises were, however, happily, disappointed; and if they experienced any surprise at all, it must have been caused by the singularly unambitious character—speaking comparatively, of course—of that dissertation of three hours which the Chancellor of the Exchequer bestowed upon the House. Essentially business-like in its tone as well as in its details, the financial statement, with a rare exception or two, to be noticed hereafter, was remarkable for its simplicity. The philosophy, not to say the romance, with which it has been Mr. Gladstone's humour to invest his Budgets was nearly, if not altogether, wanting. In the main, having a straightforward course to pursue, he told the House a plain tale, and, conscious that in his conclusions he was about to satisfy every reasonable expectation, and perhaps something more, he was, for him, unusually calm, in good humour with himself, and in excellent sympathy with an appreciative House. Dwelling for a moment on the abstract merits of the Budget, it may be said that our Finance Minister, amongst his other qualities, possesses that of suggesting, in his treatment of the subject of the national resources, matter for after-meditation, and that he seldom fails, while providing for the present, to stimulate thought and prevision for the future. The business of a Chancellor of the Exchequer, viewed with a certain strictness, is rather to mete than to restrain expenditure; but Mr. Gladstone does not take so narrow a view of his duties. He never fails to point out to Parliament and to the country the exact nature of the course they are pursuing in regard to expenditure; and he insinuates, even if he does not broadly state, that unless prudence and economy are taken as the rule, and not adopted fitfully and spasmodically as the exception, the time will come when, unblessed by the services of such a master of the art of making both ends meet as he himself is admitted to be, there will be deficiencies which will weep upon ruin. He does not hesitate to declare that high expenditure means high taxation. And although he admits the elasticity of the resources of the country which makes the task of the Minister of Finance a comparatively easy one, Mr. Gladstone does not conceal his conviction that the strain upon these resources may yet one day prove intolerable.

Something has been said of the agreeable surprises which were experienced by those who had assembled to listen to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and amongst these perhaps was his statement of the amount of the surplus at his disposal. The calculations which had been made did not place it so high as £3,741,000; but he made that out, to his own satisfaction at least. With his eye upon remission of taxation, he had conceived a scheme by means of which he did not choose to have disturbed by the want of a few hundred thousand pounds. He had fixed upon four millions as his object, and accordingly, by the imposition of a few minor duties, he attained his end, and at the same time indulged a propensity strong within him to exhibit his more delicate elephantine quality of picking up financial pins and needles. In the first place, every one welcomed with a laugh of recognition our old friend chicory, which seems fated to occupy in all Mr. Gladstone's Budgets the position which is held by the donkey which acts in advance of the Eastern caravans. There was a change in the duty on chicory, and that article typified, as usual, the eager haste of the Minister to do something practical by being made the subject of an immediate and the only resolution which we were destined to hear to-night. The proposal to license clubs to drink their liquor on the premises was probably a shock to the sensibility of Pall-mall, but it can hardly be made a cause of party contest. The bringing endowed charities within the reach of the taxgatherer, and the other miscellaneous but valuable subject matters, were doubtless intended as a consolation to Mr. Gladstone for his cession of his pet penny imposts on small packages, as well as to make up the required totality and rotundity of his surplus. Perhaps the only real grumble in this respect will be the carrier by, cyclops's eye, and the hawker, as he is, takes passengers who ought to go in stage-carriages, and so will have to pay a duty. If he could not make omnibus proprietors happy in their own way, he could minister to one of their feelings by putting their little competitors in a like case with themselves. All this was, as it were, the tuning of the instruments before they burst into that grand symphony which described the reduction of some two millions and a half in the income tax, and a million in the duty on tea. Everybody wished for this result, but few speculated largely on the doubt whether it was the more welcome when it came. The reduction of the 9d. income tax to 7d., and the return to uniformity in that as a general rate, was as much or more than could have been expected; while the plan of relieving the holders of incomes below £300 a year, by allowing to each a deduction of £60 off their gains. Before they are assessed, was something more than a relief; for it was an admission of the principle that there can be grades in the tax, and that its inequalities can be equitably adjusted. Coming from so strenuous a maintainer of the mathematical infallibility of the tax as Mr. Gladstone, it was a concession, and will elicit songs of triumph from some speculative financiers who have laid down that such a thing could be done, although their way of doing it may not have been the best. This reconstruction of the income-tax, or a reduction of £400,000 a year of its burden, and it is a substantial boon to thousands of persons by whom the pressure was keenly felt. We believe that it will also tend ultimately to add to the revenue from the tax, for evasion and shuffling will probably be in some measure cases.

No one expected that the tea duty could be reduced lower than the rate of one shilling on the pound, and therefore every one has got as much as he bargained for in this respect. There was a demand for this diminution, somewhat fanciful, perhaps, arising out of the long being connected in the minds of the public with war taxation, and it has been duly complied with; and there is an end of a high customs duty on tea for ever; that is, so long as we are blessed with a mere peace expenditure. Notwithstanding so large a remission of taxes, Mr. Gladstone is able to retain not an imaginary, a shifting, and an illusory, but a real, substantial, tangible, surplus of something over half a million, which he emphatically declares he means to hold against all comers. And here we must be forgiven if we indulge in a comment and raise an objection, which will seem to these who are enchanted with such a Budget of easement to border on hypercriticism. The Minister of Finance did not fail to point out that, wonderful as was the buoyancy of the national resources, there were actually existent in the social and threatening in the political, atmosphere, elements of danger. In the state of Lancashire, in the diplomatic relations between this country and America, there is much that renders a certain readiness of cash a necessary duty on the part of the national treasurer. It is on this account that Mr. Gladstone retains his available half million. We confess that we should have preferred his holding in hand double that sum. In giving up a portion of the duty on tea he has yielded to a sentiment rather than to a real want; for it is questionable whether the actual consumer will benefit directly by the reduction. No doubt, by abstaining from touching the tea duty, he would have given his opponents a handle of offence, and there would have been debates which cannot now arise; but we hardly believe that Mr. Gladstone has so tamed down his Parliamentary combativeness as to be seriously glad that, in the passing of his Budget through the House, he will find no foe to fight withal. It may be that he is right in the thinking that the sum of two serious calls on the taxable capabilities of the people, half a million more or less in the Treasury chest would make little difference. And, therefore, with this summing up of the arguments against our own suggestion, we heartily and sincerely concur to the duty of accepting the good which he has provided for us.

On the whole, it is impossible to deny that the Budget is based on sound principles of political economy; that it carries out in their integrity the principles which have regulated our finance and our commercial legislation for years past; and that it relieves the taxpayer largely. Furthermore, it is characterised by a feature which has been wanting in those which it has been Mr. Gladstone's fate to enunciate since the last accession to office, inasmuch as it is declaratory of considerable reduction, while it possesses the element of providence in the shape of a substantial surplus. And so, with sober satisfaction, we leave it to the commendation and the acceptance of the country.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

There was yesterday in the Bois de Boulogne of 30,000 men on the ground on which the Emperor and Empress were present.

It is said that the Emperor Napoleon has addressed an autograph letter to the Emperor of Spain, couched in rather pressing terms, on behalf of the imprisoned Protestants, in whose favour diplomatic representations have been made.

The Europe states that the Emperor Napoleon has written a letter to the Emperor of Austria upon the state of European affairs, and the receipt of the letter has created a sensation from the insurrection in Poland.

The Foles in Paris have presented to Prince Napoleon an address expressive of their gratitude for the sympathy he has manifested with the cause of Poland.

The Parisian papers are still engaged in discussing the Polish question in terms generally hostile to Russia. A pacific article in the Pays, republished in the Constitutionnel, pointing out that the present circumstances are very different from those which preceded the outbreak of the Italian War, and that there is no danger of war at present, appears to have had no effect on public opinion, which is treated with contempt by the Opinion Nationale and the other Polish advocates.

The report of M. Busson on the Budget of 1864 has been presented to the Corps Legislatif. The receipts are estimated at 1,789,487,986f., and the expenses at 1,776,141,054f., leaving a surplus of the gross sum of 5,343,982f. An additional account has been opened for expenses not classed in the Budgets of 1863 and 1864, to the value of 13,000,000f. for the departments, which amount to 221,934,192f.

The Journal de Paris has published a somewhat warning, and the Journal des Villes et Campagnes a first warning.

Mgr. Darboy, Archbishop of Paris, on Sunday received the pallium from the hands of the Apostolic Nuncio in the small church of the Lazarists, in the Rue de Sèvres. The ceremony took place in the middle of a numerous body of the clergy, among whom were four Bishops.

At the Sorbonne, on Saturday last, a young lady (Mdlle. Emma Chenu) passed a brilliant examination, and was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Sciences. This is the first instance of a woman being allowed to take honours in the University of Paris. An example was set at Lyons a short time ago.

Mdlle. Chenu was formally congratulated by M. Rhins Dowsard, who put the chief at her examination, and loudly cheered by the crowd of students.

The Moniteur of Monday publishes the full text of the treaty of friendship and commerce concluded between France and Madagascar, on the 12th of September, 1862. A special stipulation accords the most favoured nation treatment in France to the Queen of Madagascar are to be thrown open to the world, and customs duties entirely abolished.

BELGIUM.

The Budget of Ways and Means for 1864 has just been distributed. It amounts, according to the calculations of the Finance Department, to 157,837,790f. for the receipts, or 1,891,000f. more than in 1863. The sum of 157,837,790f. is the general aggregate, which is distributed as 6,867,847f., which will be appropriated to covering a part of the extraordinary expenses decreed by different laws for the execution of works of public utility.

PORTUGAL.

The Chamber of Peers has approved of the abolition of majorats (landed property descending with the title to an heir).

The Journal de Lisbonne has published the abolition of passports in Portugal already mentioned as being in contemplation.

ITALY.

Signor Farini, the late Prima Minister, has been voted by the Chambers a pension of 12,000 francs (£480) "for his life and death, in so rovert to his mother, and as many to his wife; also a "national grant" of 100,000 francs (£4000). The Chamber adopted the proposal by 190 votes against 11; it was likewise accepted in the Senate by 65 to 25. Unhappily, there is little chance of Signor Farini living to enjoy the national bounty: the latest telegrams announce that he is dying.

According to a despatch from Turin the French Government has addressed a note to the Cabinet of Turin inviting the co-operation of the Italian Government in the diplomatic solution of the Polish question.

The Italian Ministry have received a defeat in the Chamber of Deputies. Signor Lovito introduced a bill authorising the Ministry to expend certain sums to meet the urgent wants of the Administration, and although it was supported by Signor Rattazzi, it was opposed by constitutional forms. The measure was objected to as unconstitutional, and rejected.

The Grand Duchy of Baden has recognised the kingdom of Italy.

PRUSSIA.

The communal treaty with Belgium was adopted on Saturday in the Chamber of Deputies, only two members voting against it.

In the sitting of the Chamber on Thursday week, Herr von Twesten asked the Government whether it considered the late Danish proclamation relating to the Schleswig-Holstein Duchies as an infringement of the assurances given by Denmark in 1852. Herr von Bismarck-Schonhausen replied in the affirmative, and said that the Government would concert with its Federal allies, and especially with Austria, the steps to be adopted. In reply to an observation of Herr von Twesten, that no step beyond a disclaimer could be taken, as the internal dissensions of the country rendered war impossible, and that the House would oppose hostilities, M. Bismarck said that if the Government felt disposed to embark in a war it would do so without the consent of the House.

During the debate in the Chamber on Wednesday upon the bill respecting Ministerial responsibility, Herr von Bismarck declared that the present time was unsuitable for the adoption of such a measure, and that the Government therefore must refuse to sanction it. Despite this declaration on the part of the Premier, it is believed that the Chamber will pass the bill.

DENMARK.

The Legislative Assembly of Denmark and Schleswig was opened on Wednesday by the President of the Council, who read the Speech from the Throne. The Speech alluded to the marriage of Princess Alexandra, to whom it invited the Chambers to vote a dower. It also adverted to the opposition offered by the great European Powers to the proclamation severing Holstein legislatively from Denmark; but declared that that opposition should not affect the course of the decree.

Simultaneous and identical protests have been dispatched by Prussia and Austria to the Government against the Royal ordinances of the 30th of March relative to Schleswig and Holstein.

We learn from Copenhagen that the difficulties which had hitherto opposed the acceptation of the Greek throne by Prince William of Denmark have been overcome.

SWEDEN.

It is stated that the Cabinet of Stockholm have resolved, in order to constitute more expeditiously the iron-clad fleet of the country, that five sailing-vessels from 68 to 72 guns should be transformed into the former class of steam-frigates. In about twelve days the Swedes will have an effective naval war squadron. La France asserts that Sweden is maintaining her neutral pretensions, and is strongly fortifying Carlscrona, her most important maritime fort.

A communication from Stockholm says:—"Prince Constantine Czartoryski continues to be the object here of the popular ovations which greeted him on his first arrival. His every day receives invitations to dine with the heads of our principal families. He is also received with great consideration at the Palace, and has already, on two occasions, been the guest of King Charles XV."

TURKEY.

After making an excursion some little distance up the Nile, the Sultan left Alexandria yesterday week on his return to Constantinople. The Viceroy, Ismail Pasha, remained on board the Imperial yacht till the last moment, and the parting, says a telegram from the spot, was most cordial.

The Sultan arrived on Monday at Smyrna, where he was received with great enthusiasm. To-day we learn by telegram from Ephesus that his Majesty turned the first turf of works extending the Ottoman Railway.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the steamer Hansa we have received New York journals to the 11th inst.

WAR NEWS.

President Lincoln has reviewed the army of the Potomac by brigades. The inspection occupied the whole of Saturday and Monday, and Sunday the 7th inst. In the early part of the day four of the Federal ironclads were engaged. In the afternoon seven took part in the bombardment. They withdrew at five o'clock in the afternoon without having effected their object. The Confederates speak of one man killed and five badly wounded in Fort Sumter. The Federal ironclad Keokuk was injured. The Confederate ironclads took no prominent part in the engagement.

The negro expedition has evacuated Jacksonville, Florida, and, after burning the town, returned to Port Royal.

The Confederates under Generals Hill and Pettigrew, 10,000 strong, have surrounded Washington, North Carolina, which is defended by the Federal force under General Foster, estimated at 3000 strong. The Confederates have erected a battery five miles below Washington, commanding the Pamlico River, which takes place entirely their cutting off the Federal communications with Newbern. General Foster sent to Washington for reinforcements. Reinforcements left Beaufort for Washington, but was fired at by Confederate batteries on shore and compelled to return.

The siege of Vicksburg continues. General Grant had succeeded in placing a battery of 84-pounder Parrott guns beyond the levée in a position to command the Louisiana canal, which is only a few miles in length, has been commenced across the peninsula near Vicksburg, but is not yet finished. Confederate batteries on the Admiral Farragut is safe, and commands the Mississippi between Port Hudson and Vicksburg. He is thus able to stop the current of supplies which the Confederates have hitherto received from Texas by way of the Red River.

Admiral Farragut's official report of his attempt to reach Yazoo, by way of the Sunflower River, is published. During eight days he worked his way up the river, but made only seven miles. The channels were exceedingly narrow and filled with obstructions. The expedition was finally checked when within 800 yards of the point Admiral Porter had reached. He estimates that the Confederates burned 20,000 bales of cotton along his route, besides what he himself burned. Many plantation houses were also set on fire after the sack, and the negroes were unanimous in devotion to it.

The Confederate General Morgan has defeated Federals on the Tennessee River, and captured the Federal steamer Diana on the Atchafayala River, after a sharp engagement, in which the Federal Captain and several others were killed.

On the other hand, the Confederate gun-boat Vicksburg broke from her moorings during a storm, and drifted down the river until she fell into the hands of Admiral Farragut.

The Confederates have sent the Rio Grande into Mexico, and captured two Federal officers and three privates (probably "loyal" refugees from Texas). The Mexican authorities, however, having demanded the surrender of the prisoners, they were released, except one, who was reported to have been hung by the Confederates.

It is understood that no further efforts to raise negro regiments will be made in the Free States.

WASHINGTON.

The joint Committee of both Houses of Congress on the conduct of the war have presented their report. It censures General M'Clellan's whole military course since his appointment as the commander of the army of the Potomac, and ascribes to him as the cause of the failure of the army to take Richmond. General Burnside's plans for dislodging the Confederates at Fredericksburg, subsequently to the battle in December, are declared to have been thwarted by the interference of the President and of the Executive Government, acting against General Burnside from subordinate officers, and countermanded his orders for an advance.

Washington correspondents agree in stating that the relations between the British and Federal Governments are very much strained by the questions of rights of search as at an issue between them.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Governor Tod, the Republican Governor of Ohio, has been arrested by order of the grand jury of Hartford County, Connecticut, on a charge of kidnapping Dr. Gilbert, a prominent Democrat, who was arbitrarily arrested and imprisoned in Fort Lafayette. The Governor was permitted to bail.

A large meeting has been held in New York in aid of the distress among the operatives in the cotton districts of England. Archbishop M'Clellan, Archbishop Hughes, and Judge Daly addressed the meeting. An appeal to the American people has been issued by the Central Committee for the relief of Irish distress.

In Connecticut a Republican Governor and Republican State officers have been elected. Three out of the four Republican nominees for Congress have been elected, and the Legislature is also strongly Republican. The Democrats have a majority of one.

INDIA.

The Bombay mail brings intelligence from India to the 28th of March. The suppression of the progress, Lord Elgin reached Meerut on the 7th ult., and thence proceeded to Roorkee on the 10th. At the former city he was joined by the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Hugh Rose. It was supposed they would reach Umballa about the 27th ult.

It is reported that rebellion still lurks in several districts of Oude, and several persons have been arrested for circulating letters inciting the Mohammedans to rise against the British Government. The war in the Jyntesch Hills was nearly, if not quite, at an end, after a good deal of hard fighting. Several emissaries of the notorious Nana had been apprehended. The rebel leader, Feroze Shah, is said to have been sent at Surat.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams have been received through Mr. Reuter's office:—

AMERICA.

[The dates by the Nova Scotian are the same as those of the vessels whose telegrams we publish in another column, and the news of the attack on Charleston is similar, with differences, however, which impart to them additional interest.]

NEW YORK, April 11, Evening (per Nova Scotian).

The Cincinnati papers state that a fast Southern steamer has just been received in Nashville containing news to the effect that the Federal ironclads had been repulsed from before Charleston, and that a terrible battle between the land forces was progressing within sight of the city.

The Richmond Whig contains Charleston despatches, dated the 8th inst., saying that the people and troops were in high spirits at the result of yesterday's fight. The Keokuk is certainly sunk. The fighting was chiefly at a distance of 900 yards, and the Monitors cannot pass Fort Sumter without running within 600 yards. An impression prevails that the enemy will renew the attack after repairing damages. Seven Monitors are still in Charleston harbour. The machine for the removal of torpedoes floated ashore, and was captured by the Confederates.

A despatch from Charleston, dated the 9th, reports all quiet. The Monitors still in sight. Pieces of the Keokuk have floated ashore. An impression prevails that the slaughter on board the ironclad was terrible.

General Grant went to Vicksburg in person, under a flag of truce, on the 6th inst. His mission is unknown.

The British ship Surprise, and the British schooners Jon Williams, Florence Nightingale, and Scotland have been captured.

TRIESTE, April 22.

An Imperial ukase has been published ordering a general levy in the seven governments bordering on the Polish provinces now insurrated with Russia. Each government is to furnish 8000 men.

TRIESTE, April 23.

An engagement between the insurgents and the Russian troops has taken place near Wyskow. Two bridges upon the Warsaw and Vienna Railway have been rendered impassable. Several fighting has occurred at Radomsko.

TRIESTE, April 24.

The reply of the Italian Government to the French note on the affairs of Poland has been dispatched to Paris. It is said that the reply, although expressing a desire to see the support of Italy may co-operate with good effect in the steps taken by France, insists, nevertheless, on the liberty of action demanded by the special political position of Italy.

THE POLISH INSURRECTION.

It is reported from Warsaw that the text of the amnesty which has been officially published there is in accordance with that given in the St. Petersburg journals, and that the leaders of the movement are excluded from its terms.

The insurgents are carrying on their operations with increasing vigour, and the Russian Government is concentrating large forces to oppose them. On Sunday last two serious engagements took place between the insurgents and the Russian troops in the forest of Kampinos, six German miles from Warsaw and Vallanow. The latter place was burnt by the Russians during the engagement.

A collision has occurred between a party of Prussian soldiers and a band of Polish insurgents. It appears that a detachment of troops was sent to seize some waggons laden with arms which the insurgents intended to make use of in the insurgents in Russian Poland. An engagement ensued between this detachment and a band of insurgents who had attacked the Prussian convoy for the purpose of carrying away these supplies; and some thirty Poles were captured, though it seems uncertain that any lives were lost.

We learn from Warsaw that Count Edmund Wielopolski has been requested to tender his resignation, on account, it is said, of the challenge he sent to Prince Napoleon; and it is rumoured that his father, Count Wielopolski, has requested leave to resign his post, owing to a disagreement with the Council. The Polish National Committee of Warsaw also has issued a circular proclaiming against the language held by Count Wielopolski towards Prince Napoleon. The committee declares that it is bound to protest against the conduct of the Wielopolskis, who now contend with their country at home, have insulted a foreign Prince remarkable for his generous devotion to the cause of Poland.

Mr. Hennessy, M.P., has received an oration at Cracow as an expression of gratitude for his service to the cause of Poland. At a dinner given him on Sunday last the orator he made a speech declaring that the sympathies of the whole English people, and Government as well, were with the Poles, and that on this question Russia stands alone in Europe.

The Courts of Italy and Portugal have conveyed to Mr. Peterburg their adhesion to the notes of the three Powers in the affairs of Poland.

Advices from St. Petersburg state that orders have been transmitted to Admiral Lessoffski to act as squadron to cruise in the Baltic and round the Baltic, for the purpose of preventing any landing of the Poles.

The Queen has approved of M. le Comte de Castelnau (Consul-General) as Consul at Melbourne for the Empire of Austria.

In some parts of Australia the dingo or wild dog is extinct, and wallaby, paddy melons, and other bush animals are likely to be troublesome in the future.

The town of Victoria, in Vancouver Island, already contains 10,000 inhabitants, and settlements are being formed all over the island.

Mr. J. Bruce Norton, the well-known barrister of the Madras Presidency, has been appointed to the office of Advocate General, vacated by the Hon. T. S. Smith, who has left for England on sick leave.

The Library Prince of Saxe-Weimar, son of the Grand Duke, has just arrived at Heidelberg to enter the University of that place. He will remain a year, and proposes to study law and political science.

The Queen has appointed Charles Stewart Scott, Esq., now Attaché to her Majesty's Legation at Copenhagen, to be a third secretary in her Majesty's Diplomatic Service.—London Gazette.

Mr. B. H. Horne, the poet, who has for some years resided in Australia, has returned to spend on the banks dear and kept for his sons and Wife, the Australian explorers.

One of the most scientific astronomers of Italy, Batista Amici, died a few days since at Florence, at the advanced age of seventy-nine. He was known at all the learned institutions of Europe for his observations upon the planet Mars, by the aid of a new micrometer, and for the construction of the polar and equatorial diameters of the sun, he had made himself a valuable correspondent to his fellow-labourers, especially in the department of optics, connected with his science, upon which subject he was a writer. He was professor of astronomy at Florence, director of the Observatory at Pisa, and member of many of the scientific societies of Europe.

The following return to Parliament in detail of £800,000, estimated for commercial bankers, was issued on Monday last:—Humber, £4,000; Hull, £30,000; Sunderland, £20,000; Stockton, £5,000; Whitehaven, £10,000; Ramsgate, £6000; Dungeness, £19,000; Poole, £6000; Torbay, £6000; Dover, £40,000; Swansea, £6000; Bristol, £30,000; Exeter, £6000; Mersey, £40,000; the Clyde, £10,000; Aberdeen, £12,000; the Tay, £10,000; Dundee, £10,000; Montrose, £6000; Kingstown, £10,000; Belfast, £10,000; Shannon, £10,000; military purchase, £30,000. The description of each commercial banker is in accordance with the special requirements of each district.

The Madrid journals of the 10th say that the fancy-dress ball given by the Duchess of Fernan-Nuñez, which took place on the previous evening, was a most magnificent affair. More than 10,000 persons of the highest rank were present. Their Majesties arrived at midnight. The Queen wore the costume of Queen Esther, and looked admirable; the King had the exact dress of Philippe V. The Duchess de Medina-Coli represented Queen Athalie of Racine. Amongst the other costumes were a great number of the Courts of Louis XIII., XIV., and XV. The wife of the French Ambassador was in the costume of the wife of Rubens; Madame Lagrange was the Hungarian; Mdme. Ozway, Anne Boleyn; and Mdme. Lagrange were the dress of Norma. The Count de Fons Bulnis appeared as Cromwell.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Essays on the Drama, by William Bodham Donne (Tinsley Brothers). The stamp of a certain kind of excellence has already been impressed upon these essays, for they are reprinted from the Quarterly and Westminster Reviews and from Fraser's Magazine. Moreover, the reprint has reached a second edition, which is a proof that the public appreciation has not cancelled for. We have derived considerable pleasure from reading his essays; and, though we do not share his enthusiasm for the drama, do not consider it of such account as a means of popular instruction, and do not cherish any sanguine hopes of its future, we can fully appreciate the cheerful, hearty, manly, healthful, and glorified, we can, nevertheless, sympathise with him in his lamentations over its decay. It seems to us, however, that the decay is owing to his own excellent reasons why it should decline and why it should never regain the position which it held (in his opinion) once, as a medium whereby the people were taught and amused. That, again, is, we think, a little more bitter than was necessary against managers and actors. We do not think that they are more culpable than readers and also against burlesque writers. We are not able to see the wide distinction between burlesque, or even Christmas pantomime, and the legitimate drama. He should inveigh, if against any one, against those who are pleased with the trash—if it is trash—which is supplied to them by the cultivated or educated classes.

The Odes and Carmen Saeculare of Horace translated into English Verse, by John Conington, M.A. (Bell and Daldy). The Corpus Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford, in putting forward such a version as this, might have expected to be a target for the arrows of the lexicographer, the critic, the grammarian, and the scholar. Mr. Conington has not done his professorship the discredit to produce an original poet to translate a poet (even of Horace be in the highest sense a poet), and that the merits of the original should be so apparent as to make the presumption to criticise his labours. It is, therefore, with great humility that we shall venture to make a few remarks upon Mr. Conington's laudatory, upon his conception of what should be considered of the highest importance by a translator of Horace, and upon his literal translations. We cordially agree with Mr. Conington in very much that he says upon the subject of translation, and especially in his remarks upon the Alcaics of Horace, and upon his forms of the hexameter, alcaic, sapphic, &c., measures hopeless; but we differ from him when he would restrict his criticisms to the form of the verse, the

The annual festival of the St. George's Rifles was celebrated by a dinner on Thursday night in St. James's Hall, Lieutenant-Colonel Lindsay presiding.

The ancient ceremony of "churching the Judges" took place in St. Paul's Cathedral last Sunday. Lord Chief Justice Erle, Mr. Justice Williams, Mr. Baron Martin, Mr. Baron Channell, and Mr. Justice Keating being present.

A dinner was given at Willis's Rooms on Saturday evening, by the members of the United Service Institution, to Major-General Lindsay, M.P., who is going out to Canada to succeed Sir Fenwick Williams, C.B. Sir John Pakington occupied the chair.

At a meeting of the Committee appointed by the House of Commons to consider the question of making a new street from Blackfriars to the Mansion House, in connection with the proposed embankment on the northern side, held on Tuesday, Mr. Bazalgette, the engineer to the Metropolitan Board of Works, stated that the cost of the street would be £75,000.

The anniversary festival of the St. Ann's Society—established in 1792 to afford a home, clothing, maintenance, and education to orphan and other necessitous children of persons once in prosperity—was celebrated at the London Tavern on Wednesday, under the presidency of the Marquis of Bristol. There were 100 children of the Society present. The meeting was held on Monday 1851, at which only fifteen can obtain admittance. Nearly £1300 was subscribed.

The twenty-first anniversary festival of the Royal Caledonian Asylum was held on Tuesday evening at the London Tavern. The chair was taken by the Honourable Berkeley, M.P., Vice-President of the Institution for the revenue of £10,000. The number of patients last year was 146. The number at present is 140. When 78 are dismissed at the home at Putney, and 71 are out-patients. The subscriptions amounted to £1300.

A meeting of the masters and wardens of the various livery companies in the city of London was held at the Mansion House on Monday to protest against the Government bill for amalgamating the metropolitan and City police. Mr. Lord Mayor presided. The meeting was most numerously attended, and was completely unanimous in its resolutions to oppose the measure introduced by Sir George Lewis.

Last week the births of 2080 children—1052 boys and 1028 girls—were registered in London. In the corresponding week of the years 1856-62 the average number (corrected) was 1977.—The deaths in London last week were 1317. This number shows a decrease of 54 on that of the previous week, which was 1610, but is still unusually high for the middle of April. The average number of deaths calculated from the last seven years is such of the last ten years corresponding with last week, and corrected for an increasing population, is 1181. But a consequence was mentioned last week as recorded, two had attained the ages respectively of ninety-five and ninety-six.

A Parliamentary return has just been issued, showing the present financial condition of the British Museum, and giving the corresponding details connected with it. It appears that the amount expended during the last year, ending the 31st of March, 1863, was £70,341. The total sum for which the expenditure for publishing catalogues inscriptions, amounting to £179 9s. 7d. The receipts have amounted to £14,145. 15s. 6d., of which £10,000 was granted by Parliament. The estimated amount that will be required for the year ending the 31st of March, 1864, is £70,341. The total number of persons visiting the Museum during the year has been 1,024,620, an increase over those of the year 1862 of 200,262.

The Committee appointed to inquire into the bill to empower the Corporation of London to take certain powers for the purpose of a new one assembled on Tuesday. Mr. Hope Scott, Q.C., the Recorder, and Common Serjeant appeared for the bill, and stated that the bill had been approved of by the Thames Conservancy and the Corporation, and that the funds for its construction would be raised upon the security of the Consolidated Fund. Mr. Cubitt, C.E., Mr. Rumsey, and Mr. Brand, City Comptroller, were examined in favour of the bill. The plans are to be deposited on the 30th of April 1864, Bankside, two at 1737l. upon and 23ft. headway, and one at 183ft. span and 27ft. headway over Trinity Highway and Commercial-road, which are required to be ample for the navigation. All requisite arrangements to facilitate the navigation would be made in constructing the bridges; in connection with the adjacent one being built by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway.

On Wednesday the first report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords on the Metropolitan Railway communications was issued. This important document states that the committee, without any consideration as to their merits, see no reason why the London and North-Western Railway Company should not be empowered to make a junction with the Great Northern Railway; Hammersmith and City Railway Company, and Metropolitan District Railway Company, at the Paddington station; Hammersmith and City Railway Company, and London, Chatham, and Dover Railway (with the exception of the Victoria Station), at Kensington Station; Metropolitan District, Brighton, and South Coast Railway (exclusive and alterations), and London, Chatham, and Dover Railway (exclusive of Victoria Station), at the New Cross Station; Metropolitan District Railway Company, and London Bow Railway Bill, Metropolitan, Tottenham, and Hampstead Railway Bill, Rotherhithe Railway Bill, and London Railway Bill, at Farringdon Street.

LAW AND POLICE.—The Court of Queen's Bench has refused an application, made on behalf of the publisher of the Saturday Review, for a new trial in the case of Chantrey v. Spottiswoode. The Court of Justice considered the article complained of decidedly libellous.

The Rev. Mr. Bell, a non-juror Episcopalian, has failed from the verdict of the jury which found that he was a director in the British Columbia Overland Transit Company, and had assisted with the expenses of the party who started themselves to fit guidance through the American wilds. Mr. Berkeley pleaded that he promised to become a director at the next meeting, which never was fulfilled, and the Court granted his application for a new trial on that point.

Mr. Chute applied to the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench for leave of his petition of right in respect to an alleged infringement by the Admiralty of his copy right in Nelson's Shipbuilding.—The Lord Chief Justice said that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. Mr. Chute made some strong comments upon the conduct of the defence for the Crown. The Court refused to grant the rule for which he asked.

In the Exchequer, in the great Middle-level drainage case tried at the recent Norwich Assizes obtained a rule for a new trial last Saturday in the Court of Queen's Bench, on the application of the rule was that there was misdirection and that the verdict for the plaintiff was against the evidence.

In the Court of Chancery, on Saturday, the petition of Mr. Hall was argued with, was argued. The point was, whether in a will the word "or" ceases to be disjunctive and "and," and vice versâ. Vice-Chancellor Stuart reserved to consider their judgment.

Vice-Chancellor Stuart has given public warning in his court that there is a person going about extorting money from poor and incautious persons, as "office fees," which are sums quite a pretended right of the Bankruptcy Registrar and worded in the style of a notice in Chancery.

Mr. Charles Pignott has been appointed by the Lord Chancellor Keene, barrister-at-law, to be Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy in London, in the room of Mr. William Vincent Wilkins, deceased.

Colonel Wade brought last Saturday before the Bankruptcy Registrar. He had not surrendered to the bankruptcy; but, returning over Trafalgar-square, he was arrested by a creditor for 13l. 10s., and lodged in White-conduit House. As he had not surrendered to the Bankruptcy the Registrar declined to interfere, and the Colonel remains in prison.

Mr. Charles Pignott and Mr. Stanton Mayrick, charged with circulating placards misrepresenting the evidence of Lord Rosslyn on the volunteer force, appeared at the Westminster Police Court on Tuesday, and, having made ample retractions and tendered a written apology, which Lord Rosslyn accepted, the summonses was withdrawn.

A girl named Elizabeth Hunley, who had been guilty of misconduct, was placed in the vagrant ward of the St. George's-in-the-East (London) workhouse yesterday (Friday). Soon afterwards she set fire to a mattress in the lunatic-ward, and the result was the destruction of the ward. She has been committed for trial.

Spring.

(IMITATED FROM THE GREEK OF MELEAGER, B.C. 90.)

WINDS sleep, snows melt, the sea's revolt is quelled,
The blue of Heaven unveiled, and Spring beheld,
Scattering glad boons, a wreathed and fair-robed thing.
Whose path is life, as o'er the carpeting
Of emerald earth she moves with gracious tread.
Now leaves transparent with soft light are spread
Forth from the quickening branch that sways and droops
With blossom; now the meadows bloom with hoops
Of nacre and pastoral flowers. Never sits in peace
The shepherd piping for his flock's increase.
The port is void, the issuing vessels strew
A moving whiteness o'er the mirroring blue.
With shouts and wild dishevelment of hair
Bounding, the lived Bacchante hails her God.
Forth sally the thick bees; the feathery crowds
Assemble on the branch, or from high clouds
The song descends; the river teems with swans;
The thatch her swallow harbours; halcyon days
Talk softly to the sea; and brake and dell
Sequester the sweet throat of Philomel.
Then—if the leaf be new, the bare earth clad,
The flock prolific, and the shepherd glad,
Furrowed the soil, and flooded with songs
The hive satir, the heavens with winged throngs
Peopled, and music breathed from every tree,
Silent, alone, and thankless shall be he
Whose gift and boon all men is melody?
Nay, rather let him smite his lyre and sing
Hymns, with a happy heart, to genial Spring.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

WITH the Chancellor of the Exchequer succeed in his adventurous proposal to take off the duty on paper, and with Lord Granville full if a design so unprecedented be persisted in? Is the right honourable gentleman quite right in his logical appreciation of the estimate of the general fitness of things when he attempts to class establishments for the promotion of social intercourse among the vices and middle classes with bowling-and pin palaces? And there are questions which, in any state of public feeling less exceptional than the existing one, would divide opinion pretty well equal party spirit to run high, would breed the most envenomed controversy between opposite sections of the press. But in these times one is lucky, and there appears to have accepted the mission of setting them right. Language and lassitude are the rule in political and in social circles, and the latter is especially the case this season. Apathy drowsy lull is predominant. Everybody is waiting for the next move in the game; yet there are some exceptions.

Lord Chatham, with his sword drawn,
Is waiting for Sir Richard Strachan.
Is waiting for the Earl of Chatham.

It is whispered, however, that the Government proposition (which, if successful, could not be productive of anything but a combustible addition to the revenue and a widespread feeling of dissatisfaction among industrious people) was brought forward partly to checkmate Mr. Roebuck, who had registered a threat to move for the closing of the clubs on the Sunday. If so, the manœuvre reached a second reading, and partly to deter the agitators who had proclaimed their intention of obtaining the opening of museums and picture-galleries for the enforced closure of public-houses on the Sabbath by establishing poor men's clubs, with nominal subscriptions, where fermented liquors could be obtained at the lowest rate, and refreshments could be vended at all hours. The wholesale organisation of such public-houses in degrees, and clubs only by name, would undeniably be a great evil; but, on the other hand, the subjection of the existing and bona fide clubs would be to the most arbitrary and vexatious measure. The seventeen pounds odd proposed to be levied for permission to sell wines and spirits would be but a feathered arrow to the bull-dog tenacity of the clubs in collection. The modest and struggling middle-class clubs (generally the resort of professional men) would be exempt from the committees, anxious to escape from the restraint and extortion of a tavern, often hire a small house, or the upper part of one, for the privilege of lodging in their own stock of liquors for their own consumption. The 21l. tax would break up many such social and friendly associations. Moreover, let it be borne in mind that in the metropolis, large or small, there is no trading in alcoholic beverages. Beer, wine, and spirits are bought by the consumer at the hands of the licensed victualler. The consumption of any fermented liquors on Sundays is infinitesimal; and, although a few thousands of labour members may be out in the cold on Sunday, the clubs are kept open on the Sabbath mainly for reading and for conversation. It would be both cruel and absurd to allow a member to read the Observer or the Illustrated London News and prohibit his refreshing himself with a chop and a glass of sherry.

The principle of the Sunday Trading Bill is, in fact, that it is an attempt to get in the "thin end of the wedge," of which sentimentalists are so fond, but which is much likely to be rendered more subject to the thick end of licensing rules. It may be entered by authority. Fancy the magistrates refusing to renew the license to the Strollers because it appeared at nothing less guines points was habitually played there. Is Mr. Gladstone aware that at every Sunday evening concert at Exeter Hall the doors open and frequently an Oaks and an Ascot Cup one, of which the prizes are the same as those at Epsom and Ascot? Are the lord-licensing lotteries tolerated at the "Pig and Whistle" or the "Elephant and Shoestrings"? Again, have not the police a right of entry to all licensed houses? Will they be much liked by the smoking-room of the Garrick or the Army and Navy? If the Athenæum is to be closed on a "public day," will the Saturday ever show his face there? The Carlton and Reform are open to members during the whole of Parliamentary visit; and the Star and Garter, Richmond, and the Trafalgar, Greenwich, are open all the morning. Or are they to be licensed as "nighthouses," like the models of propriety known as the Cafe parisien Morlet?

If Mr. Gladstone be really serious in his club-licensing whimsey, it might be at least practicable to adopt a middle course. With the existing set of clubs he could not do much, but he might put a difference; but all future contemplated ones might be called upon to prove their bona fide character—that is to say, exclusiveness, the payment of an annual subscription, the non-admission of any strangers and the non-vexation of any ailments, liquid or solid, to any but the members and their friends introduced by them. The principle on which could now show that it was conducted on these principles should be considered as a Sunday-house, and be licensed accordingly.

We have dwelt at this length on the club-licensing question (which, if it "arrived" would be a leading article, instead of a mere "echo") because a curious and mischievous apathy has appeared in the press on the subject. The Times has pooh-poohed it as something never intended to be carried out, and the other journals have scarcely alluded to it at all. Part of the reason may be that journalistic attention is just now preoccupied by another and bolder endeavour to introduce the "thin end of the wedge." The Government bill for amalgamating the City and metropolitan police under one head (a Whitehall head) has been read a first time in the Commons. Sir George Grey is anxious to have the corporate police upon a footing of efficiency, and to get rid of jealousy, and not from a reverse of their own in the Old Jewry. The City are up in arms to resist the formidable interference with their ancient privileges and immunities, and they have hit upon the ingenious device of frightening all the corporate boroughs throughout the kingdom with foreshadowings of the sinister designs entertained towards them by the Home Secretary. "It is our turn to-day," they cry, "that to-morrow will be the turn of Manchester and Salford, of Liverpool and Birkenhead. The Medes and Persians are at the gate. Delenda est Carthago. Aldermen Sidney has been reading up history assiduously, in order to confute the Government by an array of precedents; Mr. Anderton has been thundering in the Common Council; ward meetings have been held and alarmist circulars by thousands distributed; and, whatever may be the result, the Police Amalgamation Bill will be the one engine to which the Government draws most of this furor arma, and the one great fight of the dullest Session on Parliamentary record.

We are glad of the opportunity to the unpopularity—the abhorrence mingled with contempt—felt by the Londoners for the force called the "new police," established by Sir Robert Peel in 1829. Now, there is no doubt that this police force was established for a distinct political purpose—viz., to put down the Radicals and the trades' unions; but the passing of the Reform Bill put the Radicals and unionists down much more rapidly than the police could have done. Hence a region of ferri organised for purposes of repression, the new police grew to be an admirably disciplined, and essentially public and beneficent, civic body of guardians of the public peace and property. As there were brought, however, Roman citizens who wept for Nero, or even there cockneys who regretted the old watchmen and their quarterly "charlies." Few people nowadays deny the usefulness and general efficiency of the London police, both in the City and in the West-end and suburbs; but both City and metropolitan police stand in needof thorough improvement and reform. The principal fault of the metropolitan police are that they are indolent and overbearing, and that they are not wholly exempt from imputations of taking bribes and perjuring themselves before magistrates; and the particular, the systematically fail in doing that which the City police as systematically succeed in—viz., in hunting down criminals to their lair, and in rooting out nests of vice and infamy. Nearly ten years have passed since, in Household Words, the hand which pens these lines drew attention to an abominable case des meurles, called George-street, St. Giles's; described as a hotbed of profligacy, theft, and drunkenness, and a forcing-house for murder's and burglary's most skilful and desperate professors. Within twenty yards of the abandoned place, and asked whether it was worth anybody's while to look after it. Years have gone by, and this same street, St. Giles's, has continued to nestle under the wing of the adjacent police-station, with what results every one knows.

But the police of the City would not always be in "doleful, dismal dumps." While the grim proclamation "Murder: £100 reward" was posted on the walls, the detectives were busy with the mysterious miscreants with "weak eyes and round bullyock hats"—why, our own eyes and our own ears have witnessed the wear a "bullyock" of fabulous felons in "pilot coats bottomed up to the chin," who are supposed to be hiding in hollow trees in Epping Forest, with the intention of making for no "Hue and Cry" on the coast of sighting a homeward bounding South Kensington to gaze upon the magnificent bridal gifts presented to the Princess of Denmark. Nay, we have in our eyes are a gathering of testimonials of the love and loyalty of a great nation has never been equalled.

By-the-way, an irresistible appeal has been made to our gallantry and love of justice to call attention to the fact that among the bridal presents accepted by the Princess Alexandra, but which, for some reason or another, has not found a place in the glass cases at South Kensington, is the beautiful bouquet holder of Mesdames Delaporgues exhibited in class 24 at the International Exhibition. This counterpane, made of several yards of Miss Jane Barker's lace, is such an indefatigable little lady she must be!—contains a total of stitches in roses, leaves, grapes, stars, and flowers amounting to 2,921,824. The quantity of cotton employed was 32,000 yards: the time taken for the entire completion of the counterpane was three months, and the average of stitches per minute was 1000. The only exception to the Princess a committee of ladies subscribed to line the counterpane with rich crimson silk, and to add silk, having to affix the Princess's crest and a true lover's knot, with the initials "A. A.," all worked in gold. Sic vos, non vobis multiplicatis, apes.

Both of our notices of the correspondents in America may have received an exceedingly humorous and caustic weekly publication called Vanity Fair, which, according to the New York Herald Tribune, Vanity Fair, after an existence of three or four years, has just expired. It has evidently died of starvation. It carries its own epitaph in the dearth of comic writers in America, and states that an express was sent to England to implore Mr. John Brougham and another Transatlantic humorist to come and help it out. York and even Richmond journal. We don't think that the reason given is the correct one. There is no lack of humorous writers in America. Like the Scotch, our cousins have a natural turn for grim humour and saturnine persiflage. Their present struggle, and almost every struggle in America has to struggle, and which must ultimately overwhelm it, lie in the paucity, if not the actual non-existence, of clever caricaturists and comic draughtsmen. Brougham as well as Leech. In England even we can count the really first-rate caricaturists on our fingers. When Gillray, Rowlandson, Cruikshank, Doyle, Meadows, and Tenniel have been enumerated, how many remain? In France, with Cham, Gavarni, Daumier, and Henry Monnier (we don't hold Gavarni or Couture Dori to be caricaturists at all), the catalogue sinks into mediocrity. But in America there are as yet no comic draughtsmen of the first rate of the talent which even our second-rate pictorial satirists possess.

THE DISTRESS IN THE COTTON-MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.

Mr. Commissioner Furnall, in his weekly report, read on Monday at the meeting of the Central Executive Relief Committee in Manchester, made the gratifying statement that "the relief fund still lasts. The decrease in the number of persons receiving parochial relief in the twenty-seven unions in the cotton districts during the week ending the 11th inst. numbers as relieved in the previous week, of 2356." The hon. secretary stated that twelve hundred operatives in Ashton-under-Lyne, 1001 married in Stockport, and sixty-five boxes of bacon had been sent off during the week. The total receipts for the week had been 2,000l.

The Mansion House Committee have responded to the appeals made to them to assist in promoting emigration to Canada and Queensland. They have made a sum of 2,000l for that object. One-fifth of the whole amount has been given by the Lord Mayor. Mr. Alderman Lawrence and Mr. Alderman Hale have each already voted 400l of the own funds for the purpose. Mr. Alderman Lawrence stated that the number of persons for whom financial statements showed the total amount received in the week was 42,175, of which 2,000 l. was from the Mansion House Fund, 1,000l. from Stockport, 400l. each from Mr. Alderman Lawrence and Mr. Alderman Hale. The following grants, with several minor ones, were made:—Ashton-under-Lyne, 1200; Salford, 1000; Stockport, 1000; Bolton, 1000; Oldham, 1000; Stockport, 1000.

There has been another disturbance in the manufacturing districts. The workpeople at Preston were dissatisfied with the work allotted to them and, though they all assembled at the factory gates at the usual hour in the morn, not more than a hundred engaged in it. The guardians of the poor refused to pay any relief to the idle hands. On Monday, and the commencement of the week, the disturbance was also assembled in the streets, and the windows of the policemen were broken. The authorities were obliged to call in the military, who quelled without theft and. On Wednesday morning rioting again commenced. The fire engines were not allowed to work, and, being placed on the others, proceeded to the residence of the Mayor, who, however, refused them an interview, and threatened to fire on the mob if they did not disperse. They were forcibly removed by the police, but in the course of the day the office at the magistrate's was attacked by the mob. Several persons were taken at the police. Some of the rioters have been committed for trial. The men returned their work on Thursday.

Three of the Ashton rioters were tried at the Salford New Bailey Sessions on Thursday week. Their offence was that they made common cause with the men tried at Chester, and the evidence was also similar. Two of the prisoners were sentenced to three months' and the other to six months' imprisonment.

The Council of the Archæological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland have decided on holding their congress this year in the city of Rochester; and the arrangements to make the meeting one of the most attractive ever held are proceeding most satisfactorily. The meeting will be under the patronage of the leading nobility and gentry resident in Kent and the adjoining counties. The Corporation of Rochester have placed at the disposal of the institute several of the public buildings in the city, in which to hold their meetings, and the Dean and Chapter have kindly offered to open their cathedral, as which the collection of antiquities and other objects of interest will be exhibited. The congress will be held during the last week of July.

SIR GEORGE CORNEWALL LEWIS.

MINGLED with the feeling of regret which every one has experienced at the premature death of Sir George Lewis there is much of wonder at the extraordinary aptitude for labour which his whole life exhibited. Men of letters have, not infrequently, culminated into statesmen; but there are few, if any, instances in which, side by side, in two continuous currents, ran the labour of the Government official and the multifarious author. Fitted by taste for the recluse life of a scholar and a philosopher, by sheer perseverance he engrafted on his nature the character of a statesman. In accomplishing this object he overcame the shyness and reserve of his constitutional tendencies, and, ungifted with the surface qualities which stand for so much in a Minister and a member of Parliament, he yet became an excellent administrator, and held a universally influential position in the House of Commons. Quiet student as he was, the ambition of distinction in public life was strong enough within him to place him in the front rank of those whose happiness it is to govern men and guide the State. A trifling illustration will often give the best clue to a man's character; and there is an anecdote recorded of Sir George Lewis which is eminently characteristic of the man:—He was once observed, when in a railway carriage on his way to an audience of the Queen at Osborne, as soon as the journey began, to look carefully over a journal of the day, and, its columns exhausted, he drew from his pocket a small volume, in which he became absorbed for the rest of his journey. An excusable curiosity enabled a fellow-passenger to discover that the book was—Euclydus! Born early in the present century, Sir George Lewis was educated at Eton, and Christchurch, Oxford, where he closed a distinguished undergraduateship in 1826, when he took his B.A. degree with a first class in classics and a second class in mathematics. In 1831 he was called to the Bar; but it was never his intention to follow that profession, and it was adopted only as a standpoint, from which he might pass into public life. Having, no doubt, to struggle with his studious tendencies of mind, and some defects, half physical in their nature, which interfered with that readiness of speech which is indispensable to public men, he subjected himself to a course of training which was calculated to give a practical side to his intellect. Eschewing for the present the ordinary method of preparation for statesmanship—by an apprenticeship in Parliament—he, in 1835, accepted the office of Assistant-Commissioner to report on the working of the relief of the poor in Ireland; and in 1836 he was a member of a commission of inquiry into the affairs of Malta. Subsequently he became Secretary to the Poor Law Commission, and in 1839 he succeeded his father as one of the Commissioners of that board, which office he held until 1847. With a probable prescience of the coming change in the constitution of the administration of the poor law, he resigned his office in that year, and became Secretary to the Board of Control, in Lord John Russell's Government, whence he was shortly transferred to the under-secretaryship for the Home Department. In 1850 he became Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and held that office until the retirement of Lord John Russell's Ministry, in 1852. From 1847 to this time he had been one of the members for Herefordshire; but at the general election in that year he was an unsuccessful candidate for the representation of the county, and subsequently failed in an attempt to get a seat for Peterborough. He remained out of office and out of Parliament until 1855, when, on the death of his father in that year, he succeeded him as member for the borough of New Radnor, which place he represented until his death. He re-entered Parliament at a critical moment for his future political fortunes, for, soon after, the Aberdeen Cabinet was disrupted, and, Mr. Gladstone having retired from the Ministry which Lord Palmerston had formed, Sir George Lewis was placed in the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is certain that his elevation to an office of so much importance, and of special responsibility at that time, the period of the Russian War, was viewed with some surprise; his antecedents, so far as they were known, scarcely justifying in the mind of most persons his appointment. But he showed great financial capacity, and exhibited a prudence, a caution, and a practical dealing with the public purse, which ere long won for him the confidence of Parliament and of that commercial class which is designated by the representative phrase—the City. On the return of Lord Palmerston to office in 1859 Sir George Lewis yielded his claims to the Chancellorship of the Exchequer to Mr. Gladstone, and contented himself with the Home Office, the duties of which he conducted with the same care and absence of pretension which had marked his previous career. On the death of Lord Herbert the difficulty of supplying his place at the head of the War Office was not by, as we think, a sacrificial act on the part of Sir George Lewis in accepting it. No more unongenial position could have been selected for him. Unendowed with the versatility, or rather that adaptability, which enables less able and less conscientious statesmen to fill showily offices different in kind and degree, he had once more to go through the labour of training; and, truth to say, the process was somewhat slow, for it was not until this year, and in this Session, that we could perceive that Sir George Lewis had at length mastered the duties of the War Office. That he had done so there was ample evidence; but who shall say how much the tax upon his mental system and his bodily power, which the process implied, contributed to the breaking down of his physical strength in the last twelve months. In no public office which he held did Sir George Lewis fail, and in one of them, at least, he approached to excellence.

As a scholar and an author, as a man of erudition and vast knowledge, Sir George Lewis stands confessed. In the intervals—when and where they were it is not easy to discover—of an active, busy, laborious, painstaking public life, he managed not merely to keep up his scholarship, but to dive deep into literary subjects, any one of which often, if not always, suffices for the occupation of the undivided attention of one man. With ancient literature and early Roman history he was so familiar as to have become a sceptic with regard to them; and, in common with some modern philosophic students of history, he contributed not a little to the disillusion of those who had rested their belief in past times on chroniclers who had drawn on their imaginations for their facts. His works, besides, comprise a perfect miscellany of subjects—politics, political economy, jurisprudence, astronomy, antiquities, and general literature. His earlier productions were in the shape of papers contributed to the Classical Journal and the Foreign Quarterly Review, and as early as 1828 (being then only twenty-one years old) he published a translation from the German of Boeckh's treatise "On the Public Economy of the Athenians." As a critic he dealt with the Ethics of Aristotle and the treatise of that philosopher, "De Animâ;" he reviewed an edition of "Herodotus" and wrote numerous articles on German literature; and contributed papers to various philological and classical periodicals. In 1830 he published a translation of Müller's "History and Antiquities of the Doric Race," in a preface to which he laid down the principles by which he was afterwards guided in one class of his productions, that of clothing historical truth out of mythical narrative. Evincing even then that faculty of blending the labour of authorship and officialism, when employed on the Commission in Ireland, to which allusion has been made above, he published a dissertation on the causes of the local disturbances in that country, in which he laid down some strong opinions, and enunciated remedies which were decidedly radical in their nature. A list of his contributions to the Edinburgh Review would be too long a task to transcribe in full. "The Use and Abuse of Political Terms," on "The Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion," on "Machiavelli," on "Standing Armies and Military Policy," and his "Remarks on the Government of Dependencies." These all evidently had their origin in the thoughts and studies of the scholar into the statesman which Sir George Lewis so sedulously and so successfully pursued. To these may be added his essays "On the Connection of Church and State, and the Principles of that Connection," and on, "The Extradition of Criminals." As a philologist he produced "Essays on Provincial Languages," in which he elaborately deals with the theory of the Provincial in the schism of those languages, and his "Glossary of Provincial Words used in Herefordshire," the product, perhaps, of some brief vacation in the county in which he resided, combining, in a most remarkable manner, a more relaxation from labour. An "Inquiry into the Credibility of Early Roman History," and a treatise on "The Astronomy of the Ancients," may be considered as the two works which he put his strength; but evidently a more recent edition of a long-forgotten work—that which our old friend Dogberry was at such pains to classify—was his "The Credibility of Roman History"—was a simple plaything of his leisure hours. All these books, and more besides, were wrought simultaneously with the labours—to other men engrossing—of official and Ministerial life.

When, by the course of events, Sir George Lewis was wholly without occupation as a public man, he took up the doubtful and congenial task of editing the Edinburgh Review, in which he was a constant contributor, and Member of Parliament and Chancellor of the Exchequer at a great crisis in the fortunes of England. If, however imperfectly, we have been able to trace the life of Sir George Cornewall Lewis, there is little need of summing up his claims to the respect and the admiration of his countrymen. To the world, however, to be added that in private life he was remarkable for the gentleness of his manners, and for the blameless and even serene tenor of his life. He was called to public life for his integrity, his consistency, his high principle, his moderate opinions, and his large toleration. Esteemed by his friends, and respected and trusted by his political opponents, he was defeated, as we believed, for a still higher position in the State than that which he held at his death. We will not doubtless come when his loss to the public service will be more signally recognised than it is at present, however practically it may even now be felt.

SCIENTIFIC BALLOON ASCENT.

MR. GLAISHER made his tenth scientific ascent in Mr. Coxwell's balloon from the grounds of the Crystal Palace on Tuesday last. The wind was due north, and the balloon was carried so rapidly towards the ocean that the aeronauts were compelled to descend very quickly, in order to avoid falling into the sea. As it was, by dint of coming to the ground at express railway speed, they were just able to alight on the extreme verge of the land at Newhaven, Sussex.

Mr. Glaisher gives the following account of the voyage:—

We left the earth at 1h. 17m.; within two minutes afterwards we were 2000 feet above the earth, and at 1h. 22m. we were one mile high; the second mile was passed at 1h. 29m.; the third mile at 1h. 35m.; the fourth at 1h. 39m.; and the highest point was reached about 2h. 30m.—four miles and a half nearly. At 2h. 50m. we passed below four miles; at 3h. 10m. four miles were passed at 3h. 40m., and at 3h. 50m. we were two miles from the earth, which we reached at 4h. 30m., so presently will be seen that we descended from the earth the temperature of the air was 64° deg.: at the height of one mile the thermometer read 41 deg., as we had passed up through 23 deg.; it is most likely that the reading was higher than the true temperature; at the height of two miles the reading of the thermometer was 32 deg.; at three miles the temperature was 21 deg.; at four miles, 16 deg., and at the highest point reached it was 12 deg., which was the lowest temperature observed. The results generally confirm the law as found by the combination of all the preceding observations—namely, that the decrease of temperature with increase of elevation would be abandoned.

The air was found to be extremely dry at the height of four miles, as found in all the preceding ascents. On reaching the highest point I observed the sun through glass, then, the sea of shining white clouds, extending to the horizon, was, as usual, very bright. At 2h. 30m. to 2h. 50m. I devoted myself almost entirely to observing the black line in the solar spectrum, which was thicker than the bulkiest wire ever drawn by hand that I succeeded in adjusting the slit of the apparatus to the sun, and kept my eye to the telescope whilst the balloon continued to rise. Immediately after the light entered the slit from the sun itself the lines in the spectrum were inordinately thick, and were leaving the earth's surface with the greatest velocity. The nebulous lines (H) were both seen, and the spectrum a good deal lengthened on the violet end, as also on the red end (A). When the sun came from the sky, in the immediate vicinity of the sun, the spectrum was shorter; lines were visible from H to G, or from H to G', and also the sun's spectrum shortened very quickly, and when opposite to the sun there was no spectrum—in fact, no light at all.

For the purpose of learning something of the action of the chemical rays of light I took strips of sensitized photographic paper, and commenced this similar sign mode at the same time should be exposed at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, and the amount of exposure should correspond exactly five minutes, so as to have some simultaneous observations with experience of bright and dull days in the balloon. The paper in the balloon appeared to be full rays of the sun, and with this remarkable result, that when above three miles high the paper did not colour in the least, although it was on the dark grounds of the Royal Observatory in the same time.

At 1h. 45m., at the height of 2½ miles, the solar radiation thermometer, accidentally fell over the car, from the sudden displacement of one of my instruments. I should be obliged to any one who finds it to return it to me by informing me wherewhile it fell. We were nearly at the time over Reigate, but as the clouds were so dense I was unconscious of the place at once, from which the air had been exhausted, it would not fall very rapidly, and may have fallen between Tunbridge and Hastings, or even as far as the sea coast.

The Crystal Palace remained some time in view, it was at first expected that the upper current was at rest with us here; but on reaching the highest point we found, and believed ourselves to were moving directly towards the coast, but the motion was actually against the wind, as the clouds were observed over-head. Mr. Coxwell, who was in charge of the balloon, was perfectly cool and collected on occasions (Mr. L.) to keep a sharp look-out for the land.

Immediately after we descended at 4h. 30m. Mr. Coxwell let out some gas, and said he felt assured that there was not a moment to be lost in getting within view of the earth. At 4h. 45m. we were at the height of three miles, so that we descended a mile in four minutes.

At 5h. 30m. we were 4 miles from the earth, the barometer reading 21·30 in., when Mr. Coxwell caught sight of Beachy Head, and exclaimed, "What shall we do?" and then added, "Shall we descend?" I at once exclaimed, "There is not a moment to spare; we must descend rapidly, and save the land at all risks." He said it was a bold decision, but we were in a critical position, and I do not see what else could have been done. Mr. Coxwell rent out the valve rope, and we descended rapidly; we could have alarmed any one who had not perfect confidence in his skill. I was requested to pack up the instruments quickly, and we prepared to the best in getting ready a large amount of ballast to throw away at the last moment. The descent was terrible; the clouds we appeared to be already over the water, but as the ground came up to us, or seemed to do so, we found that we had not reached it. Mr. Coxwell requested me to sit sitting up the neck lines, and in clearing the ballast for immediate delivery, so as to lessen the violence of the descent. Two orders were given to me and sand we did so simultaneously, which gave a favourable check, and, at the lower part of the balloon itself assuming a pendulous form, the shock was not so bad as might have been expected. Most of the instruments, however, were broken, owing to their delicate construction, and the concussion which arose from them; yet, strange to say, two large glass vessels of air, collected at the highest point of the ascent, remained uninjured, and are now in my possession, and commende which Mr. Coxwell had placed in the air.

We descended the last two miles by four minutes, and had we done so less rapidly the land would have been missed altogether, and we must have fallen into the sea. The descent was within half a mile of the railway station at Newhaven.

Mr. Coxwell's decision and experience were put to so severe a test as it is possible to imagine, and certainly he is entitled to my best acknowledgments.

Lord De Grey is the new Secretary for War. The successor of Lord De Grey in the Under-Secretaryship is the Marquis of Hartington. Mr. Stanfield, R.H., Hailsham, has been appointed one of the Junior Lords of the Admiralty in the room of the Marquis.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

One of the most curious effects of an exceptional Budget has been that everybody ceased to talk about it from the day after it was produced. It is only when its details come to be considered, for it seems as if they will scarcely be discussed, that it will be resuscitated that, on the morning of its production, the hopes and fears of the public were represented in the following terms:—Mr. Gladstone is ascending in St. Stephen's Hall at unheard-of hours in the morning, and were content to sit until four o'clock; in order to get first into the House Gallery; that others, more provident and knowing, hired boys of sedentary habits—singular beings, to be sure—to keep places for them in the queue reaching from the door of the very lichtest literature, who kept places till the original holders could come up. Then, for the first time, the Hon. one of the Queen's sons—Prince Alfred—accompanied by Prince Louis of Hesse, was present in the Diplomatic Gallery, and the cheer the words of the Lords of Commons assembled to hear Mr. Gladstone convert arithmetical figures into figures of speech. All this, and much more, was to have been expected. What was not expected was that, in fact, Mr. Gladstone never delivered a line connected with the Budget, or made any statement in financial statement. Of course, it would be difficult for him to speak curtly, or without due regard of periods; but, even when he was indulging in those parts of his statement which may be called philosophic finance, he was unusually simple in his style, and the force of his statements was not obscured to any extent by the gathering up of grand language and hurling it, like stones out of a catapult, at the very heads of his hearers. The fact is that distinction one ought, from the comparative gentleness of his tone and the ease of his demeanour, the absence of anything like exaggerated energy, a confidence that he had a "bon bouche" in store for the taxpayers, and that he could come down heavily in the way of remission. Indeed, while he was trying to explain the complications of duties, which probably were inevitable to his financial happiness—for he could not have dived into a trade which he did not know—the microscope is his official eye—he contrived to make one understand that there would be able compensation in his gross for this little trouble and for his own fatigue. No doubt there was a sensible groan and an excited stir on the Opposition side, especially when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he almost unconsciously indicated their members could imbibe their curious wines and their recondite cigars without paying duty. Nothing could be more simple and lucid tion, in ipping accents devoid of the letter r, as to the enormity of putting the close dwellington into the same category as that of the Bonfield. Nothing, in fact, could be easier than may be said to have been the only instance of real sensation which occurred in the course of the evening was when the Chancellor remissions in the income tax and the tea duties, if not in a just-as proportion to the duty on the articles, at least in a way that the public expected; certain it is that at the end of two hours their Royal Highnesses were not observed to yawn, and that Mr. Gladstone and Disraeli was still more palpable. As it was with him now, he digested his figures, and then proceeded to the task of criticism, and that careful subordinate sat with an elaborate declaration of notebook and pen. But as the speech went on, more stern and fixed became the face of Mr. Disraeli, more vacant the blanker and more lengthy grew Sir Stafford Northcote's face; his pencil dropped from his fingers, and the look of weariness and demeanour denoting that his occupation as second critic of the Budget was gone. Mr. Lowe, on the Treasury bench, was stay to the end of the speech; but as soon as Mr. Gladstone got to what may be called the supplement of his address—that which dealt with the Income Tax—he, too, left the House entirely, which, with some want of tact, he placed at the end instead of at the beginning of the speech, and which, as it was the part of the main interest was gone—the leader of the Opposition groped under his seat for his hat, and disappeared, and Sir Stafford Northcote followed, which all was over, and not a word to throw to a dog: and but for Mr. White interposing a long speech which he had written for the occasion, and which he delivered to empty benches, it would be as a lecture to his constituents at Brighton, the Budget on its first night would have been delivered to three hundred and fifty, of which Mr. Gladstone would have had three to his share; for he spoke exactly for that time. Where, however, was Mr. Richard? and had he no word of triumph on finding the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who quoined him so terribly three weeks ago for attempting to do the same thing, and indulging in the luxury of a speech on the tax, actually did the very thing himself on that night, eventful in more senses than one to the Nonconformist?

Three hours is a long time to talk; but it is excusable when the question is so complicated as the Budget. Three hours is not a speech of more than two hours when the subject is—savage? Enthusiasm rightly moulded as a political and a Parliamentary virtue, but when it takes the form of a blind worship of a man, and a belief that it has its origin; but a taste for such a subject, cultivated with unceasing industry and unflagging energy, and with a spirit as honourable and scientific—more or less—member the other night was delivered of a speech of three hours and a half upon the subject of the tax, actually did the very thing himself on that night, eventful in more senses than one to the Nonconformist?

Sir George Grey is an excellent man and a very tolerable administrator, but he has unhappy in the House of Commons to get up opposition to his measures in every section of the House. It seems as if the Princes Ministers Bill, which is a very simple Bill, and to the point. In the chief sinks of the Bill, which is the unpleasure with singular variety; opponents jump up in all sorts of unexpected places in the House, and the Bill has to run the gauntlet repeat at equally unlocked-for points. Why should it have roused somewhat the ire of Mr. Roebuck? Why should it have called forth evidence which he has almost uniformly preserved since 1852, when Mr. Gore Langton was first returned for Bristol? They say he does not like the Bill because it is a measure of Ministerial reform, and adverse to his appearance and performance the other night, one does not see why he should. Why should Mr. Newdegate hesitate to vote for a measure like Sir Charles Wood, though, of course, he does not equal that gentleman in the art of political dissection? Why should he not? and indeed. There was droll solemnity—if any one can understand such an apparent contradiction in terms—in Mr. Henley's manner of speaking to the Bill. He is the chief Conservative champion of Protestant Church and State, to support a measure which they mostly participate in the Roman Catholic Church, and he is the friend of Mr. Disraeli taking the same line, but in the manner in which he did it. He was in close proximity to Mr. Disraeli, and he was observed to say, and, if the truth is to be told, never made such a moss as he did in the speech which he delivered, of the nature of which some idea may be formed when I say that Mr. Henley's manner was in the spirit in terms which went direct to the appreciation of all who heard him. Mr. Bright—Mr. Disraeli—Mr. Lowe—Mr. Gladstone—in a little too bad to have it discovered that his attachment to that institution is not of the most enthusiastic kind, and his opposition; and that Mr. Newdegate should have been the discoverer. We are always glad to bring modest merit from the shade if we can; and we will do our best to let the outside world know how well Lord Edward Howard performs his duties as a member of Parliament in a very peculiar position, inasmuch as he is the only Roman Catholic returned by an English constituency, and therefore, in some sort, represents the whole Roman Catholic community in England. Here could be found strong temptation to a zealot to make himself disagreeable, and notoriety could be easily gained; but Lord Edward is possessed of such large sympathies, such good sense, so much tact, and such simplicity of demeanour, that he brings the whole matter to a practical issue for the goodwill of the House, and no one is listened to with more respect. He does not give up to his creed what was meant for mankind. The debate on which we are dwelling culminated in a speech from Mr. Whalley, which was delivered to his audience by means of his arms, for not a word could be heard for the yells and positive howling of two or three hundred of the dinnerless, whose feeding-time had long passed by, while they were cooped in the division, and whose mutinous use of those that may be heard, about five o'clock, in the vicinity of Regent's Park.

The discussion on the bill for the amalgamation of the City with the Metropolitan Police is tempting, as a subject for dissection; but it is one of those cases in which the House of Commons, after which fact of forbearance, and we desire to resist its allurements. Hating that Mr. Alderman Salomons spoke for an hour and a half to the House know what this means—briefly and generally stating that for a proposition to amalgamate the City Police with the Force of taste—to have been present at a debate in the Common Council, might have decided himself there again; and, remembering that all the bill will be fought a dozen times over in that House, and that the discussion of the measure will be all regrodused, perhaps in greater detail, we forbear now to dwell upon that unsavoury theme. Mr. George Grey was eloquent in his description of the innate strength of the Corporation of London, but what attacks made upon it, and he enumerated several of the sources of that strength; but we think that Lord Alfred Paget, in his droll, rough-and-ready way, hinted out the whole philosophy of the thing when, with mock pathos, he implored the Lord Mayor not to exclude him from the hospitality of the City because he supported the bill. The Lord Mayor himself of the Corporation is without supporters. If they are triumphant in this House, they are disposed to be magnanimous to direct the Police Force to place on either side of their escutcheon a turtle and a deer rampant.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Royal assent was given by commission to the following bills:—Selmas Exportation, Bills of Sale (Ireland), Bankruptcy (Ireland), Militia, Mutiny. The Lords Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, Lord Sydney, and Earl of St. Germans.

The Courts of Church of Scotland Bill was read a third time and passed.

The report to the Queen on the marriage of Lord Lorne with her daughter was considered and agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Duke of SOMERSET, in reply to a question from Lord Ellesborough, said the existing statutes relating to the Orphans Fund authorised the receiving officers of the Orphans that at the time Commissioners of Audit might direct. He had no doubt that the Commissioners were pointing out that the bar had shifted, and that the out channel should be made to the Consolidated Fund.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.—The Earl of HARDWICKE called attention to the subject of courts of inquiry. The Admiralty appeared to have taken part in them of setting aside the verdicts of courts-martial. He brought under their Lordships' notice the case of Captain Lord Ellesborough, who commanded the Vigilant upon the Gunfleet Sand, and strongly condemned the treatment which Lord Ellesborough had received from the Board of the Admiralty.—The Duke of SOMERSET defended the Admiralty, and observed that the steering of the vessel in broad daylight upon a well-known shoal as the Gunfleet Sand was so great a blunder, and exhibited such gross negligence, that the Court of Inquiry had no alternative but to consider their duty to censure Lord Ellesborough. They had sent to the noble Lord a copy of the evidence taken on the inquiry, which he declined, and had offered him the option of a court-martial, but he had declined it. After some observations from Lord ELLESBOROUGH, the Duke of SOMERSET said his only object was to extract an opinion as to the capacity of those courts of inquiry, and he thought that the noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty had, in answering him, availed himself of the opportunity to cast fresh reproach upon Lord Ellesborough. He was sorry that the noble Lord Ellesborough had been worse treated by his friends, who had completed his ruin, than by his enemies. He regretted the censure, both on the Admiralty itself.—The Earl of DERBY thought it right to contrary to our notions of British justice to try, condemn, and punish a man unheard. He regretted the censure giving him an opportunity of defending himself. He was of opinion that the Admiralty had acted with Lord Ellesborough with kindness.—Lord GRANVILLE defended the noble Earl who spoke last that Lord Elphinstone himself had declined to avail himself of the opportunity of a court-martial.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE, Cranworth, and Denman, the subject dropped.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Gardens (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

The English Church service in Wales Bill, which came down from the Lords, was read a first time.

Lord C. Paget stated, in answer to Mr. Longfield, that the iron-plate Committee had reported that the Admiralty were justified in their application to country and brought each of a principle which was already in operation in the Navy. The Committee had also recommended that the Government that a very large number of the private plates should be brought gauge of Sheffield and Birmingham. He could not, however, state what steps had been taken by the Government to carry out the recommendation.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Bill, the object of which is to prevent members of the Corporation of the City of London from being members of the Local Government Act merely for the purpose of escaping the operation of the Highway Act, was read a second time.

A copy of the report upon metropolitan railway schemes, made to the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, was ordered to be referred to the Select Committee of their Lordship's House now sitting.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. Bockett gave notice that, on the discussion of the Government proposal relating to the Princes Ministers Bill, he should move as an amendment, that in the opinion of the House the tax imposed upon precarious incomes should be reduced to the same rate as other incomes.

Lord Palmerston, replying to Mr. Dawson, said the Government had no precise information as to the number and scope of the summary to the Poles proclaimed by Russia. He said, however, that the Poles had not been treated with the severity which a large arrear of mercy and indulgence in the case.

Mr. A. Smith moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the Office of Woods and Forests and Public Buildings, with a view to the better management of the Act by which these were constituted different departments. Mr. F. Peel seconded the motion, which, after a few observations by Mr. Cowper, was met by a few words from Mr. Cahal, the motion was negatived without a division.

ARTIFICIAL MANURES.—Mr. CHANCE moved for a Select Committee.—Sir G. GREY moved for leave to bring in a bill for the amalgamation of the city police force with the police force of the metropolis. In doing so he drew his hearers without the House to understand that the measure was by no means to be regarded as a party or political measure, as it was supported by a host of hot mouth, although undoubtedly these events showed a great want of order and efficiency in the force of the Metropolitan police on the part of the authorities of the City of the nature of the emergency that was likely to arise. But a Royal Commission and a Committee of the House had reported in favour of the scheme enumerated by the bill, and successive Governments had given it their support. It was not, however, a measure which, in fact, by the absorption of the metropolis, which, in point of population and area, had vastly outgrown the limits of the City, and which, in fact, included Westminster and the London differed from every other in the kingdom. Its position was entirely exceptional, and it was impossible to apply to it the principles which were in force in every other district; in that no other Corporation need be under any apprehension that the measure could possibly be applied to them.—Mr. CRAWFORD seconded, and, on the second reading, he should move the rejection of the bill.—Mr. ALDERMAN Salomons, the Lord Mayor, Mr. Norris, and Sir G. Bowyer defended the City from the imputations cast upon it, and opposed the bill.—After some further debate, leave was given to bring in the bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

Lord A. Churchill gave notice of his intention to ask the Solicitor-General, on Friday night, whether British merchants trading between neutral ports would be justified in defending themselves by force of arms against the ships of War.

The Innkeepers Liability Bill was read a second time; as were also the Election during the Recess Bill and the Borough Residence Uniform Measurement Bill.

The Marriages, &c. (Ireland), Bill passed through Committee.

The Metropolitan and City of London Police Bill was brought up and read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Alkali Works Regulation Bill passed through Committee.

Several other bills were advanced a stage.

SEIZURE OF AMERICAN CRUISERS.—A discussion took place, originated by the Marquis of Clanricarde respecting the right of capturing British vessels supposed to contain contraband of war and the seizure by the Federal fleet of the Peterhoff, Commerce, and Karl Grey took part in it. It was of a precisely similar character to that which took place in the House of Commons, of which we give a brief summary.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

SEIZURE OF BRITISH VESSELS BY AMERICAN CRUISERS.

Mr. ROEBUCK called attention to the conduct of Admiral Wilkes in seizing British vessels, and strongly commented upon the unwarrantable course of proceeding of that officer.

Lord PALMERSTON said the question was one of great importance, and all he could say at present was that it was the intention of the Government to lay before members on the opposite side of the House, particularly after the explanation of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, the whole of the papers which preceded to read the correspondence which had taken place between Earl Russell and Sir Frederick Bruce Gough, in which they would see, as a ship was liable to seizure by the Americans for any letter to the Confederate States that might be in the letter-bags, and that vessels that were under such circumstances would be compelled to carry these letter-bags. He then defended the Government, generally, in the course they had taken in their correspondence with the American Government.

Mr. WYNDHAM said, however surprised the hon. Under-Secretary might be at the conduct of members on the opposite side of the House, he might rest assured that it was not from any want of confidence in the Government that some of the members of that House would not be deterred by any feeling of surprise on the part of the hon. gentleman, or of the Government generally, from asking those questions which they deemed necessary in order to gain information which it would guide them in their conduct.

Sir H. CAIRNS wished to know whether the Government had really asserted to the privilege that the American might seize any of our vessels loading with neutral ports, drag them into a prize court in the United States, and subject them to undergo a lengthened adjudication before justice could be done to the owners.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that, so far back as November last, Earl Russell communicated the seizure of our vessels by American cruisers, unless after careful search and reasonable grounds to justify the interference, found no cause for it. Earl Russell had never admitted the right to justify the indiscriminate seizure of our merchant vessels, and had sent out instructions to the American officers to be very careful not to seize upon any vessels but those that were carrying contraband of war.

Lord R. CECIL said that the Federal navy had a very small proportion of our ships, and, while our Government was considering what it should do, Mr. Adams was doing it in the field, and committing enormous wrongs by their conduct. Already the insurance rates were raised on our shipping in consequence of the fear of our relations with America. He had seen the representations of Mr. Seward were not of much value, when it was notorious that Admiral Wilkes was making the most plundering and piratical seizures.

Mr. D. DORRIEN hoped that the House would repose their utmost confidence in the integrity and discretion of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and deprecated a continuance of a discussion calculated to precipitate this country into war.

The subject then dropped, and the motion was withdrawn.

THE LATE PRINCE CONSORT'S MEMORIAL.

The House having gone into Committee of Supply—

Lord PALMERSTON, pursuant to motion, moved that a sum of £50,000 be granted to Her Majesty in aid of the funds which have been raised by subscription to commemorate the late lamented Prince Albert. The noble Viscount said the whole object of the memorial sympathised with her Majesty's feelings, and was one, as well as the country, had sustained; and, as a proof of that feeling, as well as of the respect in which the memory of the late Prince was held, he should not object to the erecting a substantial memorial to the late Illustrious Prince Consort. It was deemed desirable, owing to the selection of the design not having been made, the memorial to be given hereafter. Her Majesty intimated her desire to confine the memorial to the erection of a statue or a cross, to be erected on that part of Hyde Park near Knightsbridge Barracks. It was originally intended to combine such a monument with the erection of a hall to be dedicated to the cultivation of science and art; but, for the present, he would only refer to the memorial to the late Prince. The estimated cost of the monument to be constructed was £110,000, of which £60,000 had been already contributed by voluntary subscription.

After a short conversation, the vote was agreed to.

Several other votes were considered after the reminder of the night.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

AMERICA.

Lord BEDESDALE wished to know whether he understood rightly from the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that the British Government had not recognised the British Government to authorise their Consul to open the mail-bags of vessels sailing under the British flag, and whether any information was being carried on in this question at home between North and South America, that it might be communicated to the United States Government.

Earl RUSSELL was understood to say that no such demand had been made.

The Earl of DERBY expressed himself surprised that such demand had been made, and he learned made by the United States Government. He would ask whether they really wished the sealed mail-bag opened with the endorsement of a Consul, which might justify them in condemning the vessel in a prize court. The noble Lord wished to know whether that was a doctrine seriously to be held by the Government.

The MARQUIS of CLANRICARDE thought that such a question deserved a very careful and deliberate consideration on the part of the Government before any reply was given. He wished to know what authority the British Consul had to open a bag? He failed that he had any authority.

Lord CHELMSFORD said he had seen in the evening papers that four more English vessels had been seized, and he wished to know if any information had been received in reference thereto.

Earl RUSSELL said he had not had any official information on the subject; but it was certain that for many months English vessels had attempted to run the blockade, and had succeeded in doing so; but the number that had been of theirs in having done so; and others had been unsuccessful. Some of those who had been unsuccessful had been captured by the Federal fleet, and he would ask the opinion of the law officers of the Crown upon the matter.

Lord BROUGHAM asked how the British Government was to come to a better conclusion respecting of a treasonable nature. Was he to open it, or refer from the Government?

Lord HARDWICKE thought it would be placing the British Consul in a very unpleasant position if he were to open letters.

Lord TAUNTON commended the Government for their prudence. He hoped nothing would be done to keep the country in suspense on the question for several days.

Lord MALMESBURY wished to know whether the Government admitted or rejected the claim.

Earl RUSSELL said a modified order had been given, and, until he had obtained the opinion of the law officers of the Crown upon the question, he would reserve his reply. In the meantime the country might rest in full confidence with regard to such cases, and give his reply on Monday night.

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICE BILL.—The Qualification for Office Bill was on the motion of the Earl of DERBY moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.—Upon a division the bill was lost by a majority of 80 against 43.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY

The ALBERT TESTIMONIAL.—Mr. CUNINGHAM gave notice that on the resolution for Albert Testimonial, he should inquire whether the promised amount was sufficient, and to move that the vote laid on the table of the House regarding that subject.

The AMALGAMATION OF THE CITY AND METROPOLITAN POLICE.—Mr. HENLEY gave notice of the motion for the second reading of this bill that he should move that the second reading take place that day six months.

ARMSTRONG GUNS.—Mr. CHURCHILL asked whether merchant-ships in the prosecution of a voyage between neutral ports were liable to be seized and detained on the ground that they were conveying guns of the Armstrong pattern for the service of the Federal States of America.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that, under the circumstances would not be justified in detaining themselves by arms. That decision was laid down in the well-known case of the Swedish ship.

FACTORY HOURS.—On the order for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. H. SYDNEY moved that the Board of Trade, or some other department, be empowered to give pecuniary assistance to certain schools, in order to enable many facts in connection with those "homes."—Mr. M. GIBSON said the funds for this purpose were not sufficient to enable the Government to make proposition.

THE CASE OF JESSIE MACLACHLAN.—Mr. SURLING applied for copies of the proceedings at the trial of Jessie Maclachlan, convicted of murder at the Circuit Court at Glasgow, in September, 1862, and of the evidence taken at the subsequent inquiry before Mr. Young. The hon. gentleman detailed at some length the circumstances of the case, and commented upon the conduct of the Home Secretary and the Lord Advocate in prosecuting to conviction the woman Maclachlan; afterwards committing the sentence of death pronounced upon her, and finally as it is to be inferred from the correspondence which succeeded the inquiry.—Mr. Young that as old a man named Fleming was really guilty of the murder of Mrs. Wilson. Considering the circumstances of the case, he thought he was bound to call for the production of the papers, and, failing that, declare to investigate any alleged facts that might be offered. He could not but think that the Government had taken a very unusual course in this matter. It was their duty, have pursued any other course than that which he had taken. Upon the evidence at the trial it was the duty of the jury to find a verdict of guilty, for it was conclusive as to the woman's guilty participation. The inquiry afterwards instituted was undertaken in consequence of a statement of the prisoner read at the trial, admitting her own share of the crime, but charging old Fleming as the principal, and in accordance with the almost universal feeling that prevailed in Scotland on the subject. The result of the inquiry was to leave upon the public mind that there was the most serious doubt as to the share actually taken by the woman in the murder, though she was clearly guilty of robbery. In order, therefore, that a capital sentence should not be carried into effect, but that she should be subjected to penal servitude for life, he thought it necessary that the case should go to the country. He took upon himself the sole and undivided responsibility of advising the Crown to exercise the prerogative of mercy; but he could not consent to produce the document, because his doing so would establish the objectionable precedent of constituting the House of Commons a court of appeal in criminal cases.

THE LOSS OF THE ALEXANDRA AT LIVERPOOL.

Mr. HORSFALL called the attention of the House to the case of the seizure of the Alexandra at Liverpool, and moved for papers and correspondence connected with the subject. He thought the case was a most serious one, and that the proceedings which had been taken were both illegal and unjust. Mr. Miller, a highly respectable shipbuilder of fifty years' standing, had built the vessel in question, and on behalf of the owners, that on the board of the ship was prohibited, and that, by the orders of the Confederate agents, made against them, on the plea that the case was under consideration by the Government. The Government, however, was very proper with respect to the acts of the Federal cruisers, in such a case as this the owners would be entitled to compensation. Neutral ports are active, and common towns have advanced to the 4s. 6d. per cwt. Foreign, 3s. 6d. to 4s. per cwt.; Canada, 3s. 6d. per cwt.

Flour.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7½d. to 8d. per 4lb. loaf.

Meat.—Per 8lb. loaf.

Coals.—Most agricultural seeds are in good demand, and prices quite firm. Linseed is rather lower; but rape is in steady request, at late rates. Foreign cakes move off freely, but linseed cakes move is slow at late rates.

Hops.—Pockets of new, 6l. to 6l. 10s.; Colombia, 6os. to 70s.; Sampsonel, 42s. to 45s. per quarter; Canadian, 1s. to 1s. per bushel; English rapeseed, 35s. to 36s. per last; white ditto, 5s. to 5s.; tares, 5s. to 5s. 6d. per bushel; English rapeseed, 35s. to 36s. per last; white ditto, 40s. to 42s.; linseed, 42s. to 44s. per last; Baltic, 42s. per last; Calcutta, 42s. per last; Egyptian, 42s. per last; canary, 42s. per last; coriander, 42s. to 45s.; white mustard, 10s. to 12s. per cwt.; brown ditto, 8s. to 9s. per cwt.; rapeseed cake, 6s. to 7s.; white ditto, 8s. to 9s. per cwt.; linseed cake, 6s. to 7s.; white ditto, 8s. to 9s. per cwt.; cotton cake, 6s. to 7s.; white ditto, 8s. to 9s. per cwt.; linseed, 42s. to 44s. per last; Baltic, 42s. per last; Calcutta, 42s. per last; Egyptian, 42s. per last; canary, 42s. per last; coriander, 42s. to 45s.; white mustard, 10s. to 12s. per cwt.; brown ditto, 8s. to 9s. per cwt.; rapeseed cake, 6s. to 7s.; white ditto, 8s. to 9s. per cwt.; linseed cake, 6s. to 7s.; white ditto, 8s. to 9s. per cwt.; cotton

THE REV. H. M. BIRCH.

THE Rev. Henry Mildred Birch, eldest son of the late Rev. H. Rous Birch, of Southwold, Suffolk, was educated at Eton, whence he proceeded, as captain of the school, to King's College, Cambridge, of which society he became a Fellow, having gained the Craven scholarship and several University medals. He then became one of the masters at Eton, and while there had the distinguished honour of being selected by the Queen and Prince Consort to undertake the education of the Prince of Wales. Mr. Birch was subsequently presented by the Earl of Wilton to the valuable and important living of Prestwich, Lancashire, and, on leaving the Court, was made Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen. He is an Honorary Canon of Manchester Cathedral, and is one of the recently-appointed chaplains in the household of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

Our Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. Eastham, of Manchester.

"THE LADYE'S CHAMBER, TOWER OF LONDON." BY F. H. CALDERON.

THE lady prisoner in the suggestive little picture we have engraved is intended evidently to be Lady Jane Grey. It is, we think, surprising that incidents from Lady Jane's career—whose life and death is one of the most romantic and touching in our history — are not more commonly chosen as themes by our painters. Our artists need no longer search for the most striking episodes in the life of Marie Antoinette or Mary Queen of Scots while the sad story of Lady Jane Grey's untimely fate remains almost untouched. The materials are all at hand, from the portraits of herself and nearly all her contemporaries by Holbein, Nicholas Hilliard, or other painters and miniaturists of the time, to the minute and various accounts of her short but eventful history left by the chroniclers and her numerous biographers. Even the cells in the Tower remain to this day the same as they were centuries since, as we see, indeed, by our Engraving; for we understand this is an exact representation of one of the apartments, even to the names of noble prisoners scratched on the wall, some of which, including "JANE" and "DYDLEY," are legible even in our Engraving. Apropos of this name of Jane which occurs in the prison-room of the Beauchamp Tower, and is repeated on another of the walls of the same apartment, it may be pertinent to remark that doubts exist as to its having been incised by the hand of Lady Jane herself. The repetition of the signature has been fancifully assumed to convey an intimation that by it she at once styled herself a Queen, and that even the horrors of a prison could not force her to relinquish that title. But this idea is not borne out by history. On the contrary, there is documentary proof that Lady Jane accepted the regal title very reluctantly, and only upon the urgent and imperative requirement and plausible representations of her tyrannical father, the Duke of Suffolk, and her ambitious father-in-law, the Duke of Northumberland, probably aided the affectionate solicitations of her husband, Lord Guildford Dudley. But doubts, as we have intimated, exist whether this name was cut by the hand of the illustrious victim to royalty. Mr. Bayley, in his "History and Antiquities of the Tower," says "however severe might formerly have been the treatment of State delinquents, a sense of delicacy seems always to have been preserved towards the weaker sex; and when a female of distinction had the misfortune to be committed to the Tower she was usually confined in the private house of the Lieutenant or some other respectable officer of the fortress. It is, therefore, highly improbable that this room could have been the place of confinement of Lady Jane; indeed, we are almost certain that it was not, for at that period we have proof that it was the prison of some, at least, of the Dudleys; and it is hardly to be imagined that she should have been placed in the same apartment with them. There seems better reason to conjecture that these two inscriptions, instead of having been made by Lady Jane Grey herself, were cut by one of the sons of the Duke of Northumberland; and, supposing the unhappy Guildford to have been immured here, as were his brothers, nothing can be conceived more natural than that he should have thus dwelt upon the name of her who was so near and dear to him—to whom he was bound by the strongest ties of affection, and whose fate was so closely interwoven with his own." For our own part, we do not entirely subscribe to this view, although we thought it right to give it. Nor if it be so need we allow an antiquarian objection to prevent our enjoyment of even an artistic license. Mr. Calderon has certainly realised the loneliness and anguish of the beautiful and accomplished prisoner by her position and attitude, and the boldness of composition, suggesting the solitary vacancy of the room. From the window out of which she looks, wrapt in prayer, she is said to have seen, on the very day of her execution within the precincts of the Tower, the corse of her husband brought from Tower-hill; but another account, in which she is represented to have met it as she was on her way to the scaffold, is more probably correct. The old folio books and the illuminated volume lying about the chamber remind us of her extraordinary learning. The reader will remember Roger Ascham's account of finding her reading the "Phædo" of Plato in Greek, instead of joining her family, who were hunting in the park at Bradgate. Sir Thomas Chaloner tells us that, although scarcely eighteen years of age when she was beheaded, the Lady Jane was well versed in the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabic, French, and Italian languages; that she had a natural wit, which was improved by art and study; that she played well on instrumental music (note the flute in the Engraving), wrote a curious hand, and was excellent at her needle; and that, notwithstanding all these rare endowments, she was of a mild, humble, and modest spirit, and never showed an elated mind till she showed it at her death.

This admirable little picture was lately in the collection of Mr. Morby, Cornhill.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN PIANINO (the only Pianino to which the Prize Medal was awarded).—The only Pianino to unite the full compass of seven octaves, rich and sonorous tone, elegant and compact form, admirably adapted to small rooms, packed, besides, &c. Warranted to keep in tune, and to be the best and cheapest Pianoforte ever produced, and all the latest improvements.
Made in mahogany, rosewood, or walnut, 35 and 38 guineas. A great variety also at 45 guineas.
Chappell and Co.'s, 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL'S NEW TWENTY-GUINEA PIANOFORTE, with check action, in handsome mahogany and full compass. This Instrument has only just been brought to perfection, at a foreign factory, expressly built with the view of making a really superior Instrument at the lowest price possible. The touch is elastic, and the tone pure and even throughout, rich and thumbs sweet; and is in all respects a size piano of the highest as well as a perfectly satisfactory pianoforte. Messrs. Chappell and Co. strongly recommend this Pianoforte as superior to any hitherto in moderate or other cheap instruments. The advantage to purchasers of dealing with the actual manufacturers, and thus avoiding all intermediate profits, and the price is low as only to be attainable by the best machinery in a part of France where skilled labour is proportionately cheap.
Chappell and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL'S COTTAGE PIANOFORTE, with check action, in handsome oak case, 25 GUINEAS. This Model will be found the most perfectly satisfactory Instrument, at a moderate price, ever yet produced. The full compass of seven octaves as the above makers, and therefore especially adapted to the country where it is difficult to procure tuning. The touch is elastic, and the tone is full and even throughout. The case is strong and neat, and every support to other instruments at 50 guineas, price 25 guineas; in walnut, 27 guineas.
Chappell and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

BROADWOOD, COLLARD, and ERARD. The Public are respectfully informed that all the Instruments of these celebrated makers may be tried side by side at CHAPPELL and CO.'S, 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE, price 50 guineas in rosewood; or in walnut, 52 guineas. This Instrument has been made to the order and finished by the most eminent makers in Germany. It is strengthened by every possible contrivance to resist the influence of climate, and is therefore suitable to any situation. The touch is elastic, and the tone is of great power and quality, and of delicious sweetness. It is a full-sized cottage pianoforte, of the best possible construction, and of the most elegant appearance, and (all duties paid) is within the reach of the most moderate purchase.
Chappell and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

ERARD'S NEW BOUDOIR GRAND PIANOFORTE, of the most elegant construction, brought to perfection, can be hired, with the option of purchase, at CHAPPELL and CO.'S, 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL and CO., 50, New Bond-street.

THE NEW FLUTE.—The Full System of Fingering, with important improvements.—These celebrated Flutes, by RUDALL, RUDALL, and ROSE, are manufactured in every key from 4 to 16 guineas, by R. ARTHUR CHAPPELL, 314, Regent-street, where Illustrated Price Lists may be obtained.

ANTOINE COURTOIS' CORNETS-à-PISTONS.—These celebrated instruments, used by every principal performer throughout the world, are manufactured by R. ARTHUR CHAPPELL, 314, Regent-street, from whom price-lists and drawings may be obtained.

CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD'S CELEBRATED PIANOFORTE, 90 guineas. The largest in Europe.
Every Instrument by the above firm is at least equal to the descriptions given of the Exhibition Pianofortes, and superior to those from the stock.
Pianofortes of all the eminent English, Continental, and American Manufacturers, for Sale or Hire.

EASY TERMS OF PURCHASE.—CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD'S Pianofortes, with the option of purchase, for 20 guineas per annum, or 22 guineas per annum.—201, Regent-street.

CRAMER'S ENGLISH PIANETTE, the most elegant and Cheapest Cottage Model and small Instrument. It has all the excellence of the best Pianoforte—check action, trichord, and full compass. The tone is pure, even, and of great power, and the touch is elastic. The case is of the most elegant and at the same time strength and much less rapidity than a case of the usual form. The Pianette is 4 feet 2 inches high, 3 feet 4 inches wide, and 2 feet 1 inch deep.
The Pianette is particularly requested to observe that this instrument is entirely manufactured on the premises of the actual makers, and that Cramer and Co. are the only manufacturers of it in England.

CRAMER'S DRAWING-ROOM COTTAGE. Cramer and Co. manufacture a Cottage Pianoforte of the most elegant construction, and of the best possible quality of tone and touch, for 50 guineas. Many hundreds of these have been sold, and although the limit of improvement has been considered impossible, still improvement has been produced with an elegance of design, and a perfection of tone and mechanical construction, deserved for it universal approbation. No better Pianoforte of this class can possibly be made. In rosewood, 50 guineas; in walnut, 52 guineas.
201, Regent-street.

SECONDHAND PIANOFORTES.—A great number of Instruments by Broadwood, Collard, and Erard, for Sale or Hire, at CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD'S, 201, Regent-street.

CRAMER'S HARMONIUMS, as manufactured by the inventor of the Harmonium, Mr. ALEXANDRE, are the only Instruments which have been pronounced by the Jury of the International Exhibition to be worthy of the Prize Medal. The superiority has been incontestably maintained.

MUTU COOMÀRA SWÀMY MUDELIÀR.

Mutu Coomàra Swàmy Mudeliàr, the first non-Christian Hindoo gentleman who has been called to the English Bar, belongs to one of the most distinguished families of the haut monde of the East. He comes of the Tamil race, which, comprising a population of no less than fifteen millions of Hindoos, form the principal inhabitants of not only Southern India, but also of the best portion of the adjoining island of Ceylon. The Tamils are the most enterprising and energetic of the numerous "nationalities" of India. Not only have they forced their way to the neighbouring islands of the Mauritius, Reunion, and Pulo-Penang, but colonies of them also to be found in Aden, the West Indies, and, in small numbers, even in Australia. As wealthy bankers and merchants, the Tamil chettias are well known to European merchants in India. Being the capitalists of the land, it is they who principally purchase all European commodities wholesale for distribution to the different districts of Southern India. They also enter into large contracts with Europeans for the supply of cotton; and the American crisis has in no small degree conduced to the acquisition of large fortunes even in India and amongst the Indians. There are to be found also large landed proprietors and semindars amongst them. The industry and skill which they bring to bear on the cultivation of their fields and gardens, especially in the north of Ceylon, where, from the absence of rivers and works of irrigation, wells have to be sunk and the paddy and tobacco lands supplied with water therefrom, have extorted the admiration of every observer. Nor have they been unmindful of the benefits of English education. Their youth have shown great aptitude for the study of mathematics, mechanics, and jurisprudence. A Tamil engineer is now employed in the construction of railways in the Madras presidency, and there is another in Ceylon who was publicly thanked by its Governor for his services in the construction and completion of an important bridge in the island. Nor is it difficult to find among them men who can correctly predict an eclipse, explain the calculus of Newton, or propound the laws of navigation. As lawyers, while they have, in the French settlement of Pondicherry (in India), raised themselves to the position of avocats and judges of the "Supreme Tribunal," and plead and deliver judgment in the best Parisian French, they have also displayed equal versatility as pleaders and magistrates in the English courts of Madras and Ceylon.

The flower of the Tamil race is perhaps to be found in the north of Ceylon. Here undoubtedly the purest Tamil is spoken in the present day; and since Madura, in the Madras Presidency (reputed in ancient times, and under the august influence of the Pandian Kings, the Ptolomies of India, to have been the Athens of Southern Hindostan), ceased to be a seat of learning under repeated aggressions from the barbaric hordes of Hyder Ali and Tippoo Sahib, Jaffna, the capital of the north of Ceylon, has become the great focus of the Tamil savants. Here Oriental learning yet flourishes side by side with Occidental seminaries and colleges. The American Mission have been long at work in Jaffna, and there are converts to Christianity now engaged in disseminating the truths of the Gospel amongst their countrymen. There are few places in the East where one could find a community of men as orderly, intelligent, and industrious as the Tamils of Jaffna. The Government of the district is happily placed in the hands of a civil officer of great ability and disinterestedness—Mr. Dyke, a gentleman who, unlike those whose object, in taking employment in the East, is to amass a fortune and return home, has been with the Tamils for nearly thirty-five years, and who, refusing all promotion that should remove him from among them, is determined to devote the rest of his life towards the amelioration of a race whose fine qualities have made him their warm friend and champion.

After the cession of Ceylon by the Dutch to the English, a Legislative Council was established for the better administering of its Government. Each race had its representative there. Aromogatta Pulle Coomàra Swàmy Mudeliàr was the first member for the Tamils. He was appointed to this distinguished post, not merely from his high status amongst his countrymen, but also as a reward for the important services which he had rendered to the British Government and to the Tamils for upwards of forty years. In the different expeditions which the British Army had to make to Kandy, before the hill country of Ceylon was finally subjugated; in the entering into treaties with the Kandian Tamil Princes, as well as in the pearl-fisheries of Aripo and in the council board of Colombo, Coomàra Swàmy Mudeliàr had shown such abilities and attachment to the English rule as to have induced the British Government to present him with several gold medals, and to have drawn public approbation from successive English Governors of Ceylon.

His only son is Mutu Coomàra Swàmy Mudeliàr, who lost his father during his infancy. His education was, however, not neglected: he had the benefit of several English tutors, and he completed his education in Queen's College, Colombo, under the presidency of the Rev. B. Hooks, M.A. In 1851 M. Coomàra Swàmy became the successful competitor for the "Turnour Prize," awarded by the Ceylon Government for the best student in Greek, Latin, and English classics. Since then he had the advantage of a course of reading under the Rev. Dr. MacVicar, who was at the head of the Scotch Church in Ceylon, and who is known as a metaphysician and natural philosopher of great ability, and as the author of several recondite works on various branches of human knowledge. Mr. C. Swàmy studied for the profession of the law, and became an Advocate in 1856. In the practice of his profession, and in the study of other European languages and literature than the English, he devoted his time till 1862, when, a vacancy occurring in the Legislative Council of Ceylon, the Tamils petitioned for his appointment to the seat of the Tamil member which his father had first filled. Sir Charles MacCarthy, Bart., the present able Governor of this thriving colony, a gentleman of exceedingly liberal views, ever ready to encourage merit and talent amongst the natives, promptly acceded to the wishes of the Tamils. After having served in the council for some time, and given great satisfaction to the constituency which prayed for his appointment and the Government which appointed him, Coomàra Swàmy has now visited Europe.

Coomàra Swàmy Mudeliàr has, since his arrival in England, been called to the English Bar at Lincoln's Inn. Not being a Christian, he had many difficulties to encounter before admission; but he has at last succeeded in surmounting the difficulties raised, and he has now the satisfaction of having pioneered the way for the admission of his countrymen to the English Bar. He is thus the first non-Christian Hindoo-English barrister. The Times, in alluding to his call and in discussing the general subject of Indian education in a recent article, makes the following apt remarks on the subject:—"As a mark of the progress which the Hindoo aristocracy has of late made, we may mention that only a few days ago our journal announced, among those called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn, the name of an Indian gentleman of rank and position in the East—Mutu Coomàra Swàmy, who is a member of the Legislative Council of Ceylon, and the representative of the Tamil nation in it—the first non-Christian Hindoo who has gained admission into the ranks of the English Bar. This shows that Indians are no longer content to remain in idleness, but, appreciating the advantages of our Government and institutions, are prepared to qualify themselves by every means in their power for the various posts of distinction and honour, which, under the last proclamation of the Queen to the Hindoos—their Magna Charta—they are entitled to fill." We may add that Coomàra Swàmy has taken great interest in the proceedings of the Royal Asiatic Society of Ceylon, to the journal of which society he has contributed several interesting articles on Indian religions and literature. He has the satisfaction of having been elected a member of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain. During his short stay in England he has gained many friends, and we trust that he will carry back with him to his native country a pleasant impression of his sojourn amongst us.

BIRTHDAY FESTIVITIES AT HINDLIP HALL.

THERE are few spots more beautiful in the picturesque district surrounding Worcester than Hindlip Hall, the mansion and park of Mr. Henry Allsopp, head of the world-renowned firm known as "Samuel Allsopp and Sons," so long established at Burton-on-Trent. Hindlip is situated about five miles from the ancient city of Worcester. The original edifice—one of those quaint mansions of the olden time which Nash and Cattermole loved so well to draw, belonged to the Tudor period, and was rich in turrets and carved gables. From the house at Hindlip, so runs the folk lore of the county, was written to Lord Montegle that famous missive which led to the discovery [of the Gunpowder Plot. When the old place was pulled down, early in this century, and the structure—a very handsome one—erected on its site, numerous secret chambers, entered by trap-doors and sliding panels, with other occult contrivances, were discovered; and even now the cellars retain all the peculiarities belonging to mediæval times. Hindlip Hall is approached from the Worcester road by a drive through a shrubbery of nearly a mile in extent, at the end of which is the pretty church of the hamlet, with its ivy-mantled tower and rustic graveyard, the latter containing numerous memorials of the old Catholic possessors of the estate, the Southwell family.

Within the last fortnight Hindlip Hall has been the scene of festive doings, and of demonstrations of the most gratifying character. On Wednesday, the 8th inst., the eldest son of Mr. Henry Allsopp attained his majority, and the event was celebrated by a series of fêtes in every way worthy the wealth and position of his family. On the morning of Wednesday a recognition, characteristically English, of the joyful nature of the occasion was given in the form of a breakfast, to which the tenantry were invited at Hindlip, and—the apparent solecism must be excused—a "field" of about three hundred gentlemen partook of breakfast in the "hall," which, in point of architectural grands rands, and a fox killed near Alcester. Meanwhile most extensive preparations had been made at Hindlip for the entertainment of about a several hundred guests had been invited, it was absolutely necessary to add to the capabilities of the house by the erection of a temporary pavilion on the upper front. This was intrusted to the practised hand of Mr. Benjamin Bellgrove, of London, and upon a visit to it we can unexpectedly that if ever the Decorative Journal is to be collected, he should be raised to it, with the additional grade at a Marquee. This impertinent aside de deux was not to be. The pavilion, at Hindlip, Hindlip, with crimson and white drapery, and brilliantly lighted. Beyond the pavilion, triumphal arches, conspicuous among them and other floral decorations, spanned the various approaches to the house, and the "coming events" of the host and hostess's hospitality "cast their shadows before"—or rather their lights, in the guise of a "Welcome" inscribed in a colossal illumination composed of variegated lamps. The arms of the family, with the Allsopp monogram of the young heir, worked out in various ingenious heraldic colours, were among the decorations, all of which exhibited colours, were among the decorations, all of which exhibited colours, were among the decorations, all of which exhibited

FINE ARTS.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

We are engraving the façade of the entrance to the new gallery of the body of Painters in Water Colours, heretofore known as the "new" society, but now styling themselves as at the head of their notice. With the illustration, which we purpose offering next week, we shall furnish the new gallery of the "Institute," and give a few notes on the history of the artistic association.

The Institute is inaugurated with an exhibition of a somewhat monotonous character, but collectively of more than average excellence. The older and better-known members appear to have made no unusual effort on this occasion. We may, however, except Mr. Tidey. This artist contributes a religious work, the subject "Christ Blessing Little Children" (245), which, whatever may be thought of the suitability of the medium for an important sacred theme, deserves recognition as a work of higher aim than most other works in the gallery. We are cognizant of his drawing, and shall, therefore, have a better opportunity for describing it. As if to test the capabilities of water colours in every degree, Mr. Tidey also sends an expressive bit of "Study" (164) of a female head; we confess, however, we see no corresponding advantage gained by the enlarged scale. Mr. Rose of Warrow, the President of the Institute, is seen to greater advantage than in his recent illustrations of Dove's poetry, in two pieces of English rustic life in the last century, "The Morning Beam" (36) and "The Sunny Side of the Wall" (44). The "motif" of the first—a girl shading her eyes from the sunlight—is one we have frequently given, seeing that the morning ray falls on the trees rather than the face; but the more graceful standing figure of the girl in the second drawing is consistent throughout, and in both the colour is full and rich. The "Camels approaching a Desert Well" (109) gives a view of Eastern subject upon which Mr. Warren's reputation chiefly rests; but it is not a very favourable example.

Mr. R. Corbould's "Ladie of Orchynwell House" (3), a full-length portrait of a lady in an interior, rich with stained glass and quaint device of carving, has extreme difficulty overcome. It is a work of great sacrifice of relative and characteristic truth. The "stippling" of the face (which, by-the-way, is somewhat less insipid than usual), differs from the execution of any other part of the picture; the dress and the accessories are painted with a dark opaque and gummy vieidity which is in direct contrast with the flesh and the glass. The whole, without attaining the transparent depth of oil, the aerial quality, the distinctive beauty of water colours, produces neither the one nor the other. Cleverness and richness, some conventionality both of feeling and execution must also be urged against "The Fete Day" (72), a Knight in armour, two Ladies of no particular age, and a Page, grouped in front over a tapestried balcony on a procession supposed to be passing beneath the latter window which similar to many of the others, is also too are grouped. Mr. Corbould's third and most elaborate drawing exhibited "A Baronial Festival" (84), "Drinking to the Health of the Virgin" given takes the form of a Gothic altar, with triptych, reredos, sostchoons, inscriptions of German legend, &c., and has some affinity in composition to the new altar and stained glass window in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. The doors of the central compartment of the triptych are opened, and the baptism of Jesus is seen in the visionary representation of the late Prince Consort as a Christian warrior, two Archangels standing on each side as supporters of the good fight. On the inside of the opened doors are subjects intended, it must be inferred, as ideal types or symbolical suggestions of the Christian nobility and his work, and the Duchess of Kent, under the garment of the Last Supper, the bronze serpent, and Moses striking the rock. The knee-shield above contains the Our Saviour in glory "in his majesty," as similar mediæval subjects are termed, at whose feet the princely figure has his own name and shield; while the side are of St. George and the Dragon, and Michael and the Dragon.

Mr. Absolon—who, after an interval of oil painting, returns to the medium in which he has been most successful—has a very pleasant "pretty, though rather superficial, attractiveness—sends a large drawing, "A Lesson in the Ring at Hampstead Heath" (5). The same effect, a bourn donnel is asleep in a fern-brake, with, however, no trace of previous sadness in face or figure to account for the lines "When Sorrow slumbers Wake it not" (263). Two contributions by Mr. Wehnert have much of the artist's usual solidity and power of colour, save (when unexaggerated) the two technical qualities of his earlier work. In one of these (85) Dr. Quarles is shown among the tombs of generations from the family armour. The other (301) represents the bockshiding monk Fra Filipo Lippi, whose adventurous life reads like a dark tale of Italian romance, making love to her patient in the cloister doors, to Lucretia Buti, the nun who sat to him for a picture of the Virgin, and who afterwards escaped from her convent with the painter. Lippi, it must be remembered, was a painter in tempera, the ancient form of water colours; hence the drawing assumes a mediæval look in the easel. This tempting but dangerous subject is rendered hopelessly offensive by the vulgarly-lewd expression of the misnamed Lucretia.

Mr. Louis Haghe, who so much increased the interest of his admirably-painted interiors by the animated groups of figures he introduced so appropriately, and the incidents of character so skilfully, has two large and elaborate works. One is "The Doge, Andrea Dandolo, Leaving the Church of St. Mark after Matins, the Cross" (62). The gloomy old Byzantine interior, and the enthusiasm of all classes of Venetians at this signal for joining the procession, make a capital picture. The other drawing, "Count Collini and Francis I. at Fontainebleau" (273), is an incident suggested by the great sculptor and mural-painter's biography. Mr. Haghe has, however, taken an unwarrantable liberty with his authority. The passages quoted in the catalogue (and, we suppose, the same to any visit to Fontainebleau, as Mr. Haghe represents, but when Collini was upon the King at Paris to show him his improvements for the gates and the model of the fountain at Fontainebleau. Later in his narrative Collini describes his visit to Fontainebleau with (not the model of the fountain and in this drawing, Mr. Haghe has the statue of Jupiter, which he was directed to place in the magnificent Renaissance gallery that Mr. Haghe has painted so well), and where the offended Mûme. d'Etampes had secretly, but in vain, as the event proved, contrived, for his expenditure, to have a number of bronze copies from antique works previously placed. The picture, Mr. Haghe as a figure-painter and colourist to greater advantage in subjects from his native Netherlands, than even in many more striking drawings.

Herr Carl Werner has been filling his portfolio in the East, and exhibits a number of extremely effective drawings, chiefly architectural, of the scenes in and about Jerusalem, the Temple, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, Bethany, &c. Mr. Werner has evidently expressents the famous "Wailing-place of the Jews" (88)—the wall composed of immense blocks of stone that are supposed to be part of the substructure of the original Temple of Solomon, and at which pilgrim Jews, male and female, pour out their lamentations. Another and even greater builder still hears them, certain specially sacred stones of the wall, even the wonder, let us remind the reader, of the Queen's prize at Wimbledon two years back) sends seven or eight drawings of Roman studies, free from the photographic rigidity we have observed in previous drawings—"The Madre col Bambino" (124), a Roman mother and child, with a stained-glass window like a nimbus round the whole group, and a lovely profile of a girl entering a church and dipping her fingers in the aqua benedetta as she enters to the customary prayer, "O, sancte Madonna, ora pro me!" (178). With the mention of a dashing and vigorous, though rather disproportionate, representation, by Mr. E. Murray, of a burly Spanish priest, plied for "Choral Service" (149) by an ugly woman, the vendor of church trinkets on the one side, and a pretty dealer in lottery tickets on the other, and apparently inclining to the latter; a very well painted "Village School" (9), by Miss Farmer; and some rustic pieces by Mr. Lee; we think we have included the most noteworthy figure subjects in this exhibition.

We very much regret that the pressure on our space compels us to postpone our remarks on the landscapes in this exhibition till next week.

SOCIETY OF FEMALE ARTISTS.

The seventh annual exhibition of this society has just opened. The members of the society and the promoters of these exhibitions have purchased a lease for, we believe, seven years of a gallery in Conduit Street, Hanover Square, and have fitted it up with a commodious room for the exhibition of their works. We are glad that an exhibition which must in many cases confer benefit upon deserving but undirected merit is at length established in a settled position and locality.

The present exhibition is very creditable to the ladies, especially when we remember the number of most distinguished artists of the sex who exhibit at other galleries. Two eminent foreign contributors to the present exhibition are entitled to first notice, not so much, perhaps, by merit as courtesy. The Swedish painter, Mdlle. Hedwall, sends two pictures, illustrative of the Swedish national Exhibition, sends two oil-pictures representing, with some boldness and neutrality of colour, but with very admirable simplicity the sacrifice which to many a mother's heart is the Christian life. In the one an old dame chuckles delightedly at the baptism of her grandchild, "Treated to a Christening" is the other, a Swedish girl is gathering the family herds among the mountains by the sound of the horn. The other foreign contributor is the Polish painter, Mdme. Jerichau, has two characteristic and soundly-executed pictures, "A Grouped Together, of the Brothers Grimm, the great German scholars; and a large and elaborate work, "A Birthday," an allegorical treatment of which will, however, find few admirers. Mdme. Jerichau is a Danish lady married to a Polish artist and studied to say in the room, though her details are rather slighted. One at least of her pictures is worthy, but her flesh-painting is fresh and English. "The Butterfly and the lice" represent two girls in mediæval costume, the lady dealing her sister with flowers, the other industriously mending nets. The window-light on the latter girl is given with remarkable force and truth. Though less admirable in execution, the "Spring Greet" has the higher merit of sympathy with loveliness, and earnest pathos. An old peasant-woman, Mdme. Jerichau's own years, apparently, and her features, sits sadly beside her cheerless hearth, while her little grandchild, with innocent, upturned eager, rays grace over the poor meal of soup. Mdme. Jerichau's style, the artist's own, is distinctly visible in the pleasing picture of two French matelots "On the Look-out" (151) in a sea-piece entitled "Off the Coast; but the most valuable and finished picture of Miss Edwards has a well-conceived little picture of a Scotch fisherman's family, the father and mother in bed, describing him to remain—entitled "Heading for Peace" (150). Several very pleasing drawings from child models, effective in colour, and happy in their simplicity of composition, are among the works contributed by Mrs. Backhouse. There are other meritorious figure-studies by Miss Ellen Edwards, Miss Greenaway, and Miss Mary Mudd" (3)—but all her works are excellently drawn; by Miss Emma Brindley, "Lady Jane Grey's Farewell to Guilford" (4), and "Our Baby" by Miss Sophia Beale, "St. Bernard of Clairvaux" (88), which decidedly deserved a better place; and by Miss Eliza Walker. The last lady has a very pleasing portrait of "Mrs. Jones," and a portrait of Glenn, the sculptor; and the same remark applies to a Mr. Dudley, by Miss Lucy Gibson. Miss Lucy Ingle has a portrait of Grierson, has promise.

In the department of landscape and architecture there are many noteworthy works both in oil and water colours. Mrs. Paul Naftel's drawings of Guernsey would show to advantage beside the well-known works of Mr. Wolfe, Jersey. Miss Mutrie's flower and fruit pieces are directly recalled, and not discredited, by Miss Maria Harrison's "Study of Flowers." Miss Loyell, Miss Mutrie's pupil, also admirable street views in Chester and elsewhere, and the excellent drawings of Miss Ellen Edwards, Miss Ada Cross, and Miss Robertson Blaine, Miss J. Forster, Miss Isabella Jones, and Miss Dobbs are also deserving of commendation. Miss Mary Gillies sends a collection of still-life. Prominent among these are Miss W. E. Oakley's "Study of Fruit" (179); a Miss Hall's excellent effective study of a "Dead Blue Tit" (194), by Miss Elizabeth Symon; very careful drawings by Mrs. Withers; and a study of a muskrat, red squirrel, and other animals, by Miss Mary Thompson, and Mr. Florence Peel. In the last-named the character of the several fish is given with great truth, and the colour of the water is very natural. Noticeable works coming under the same denomination are also exhibited by Miss E. Hall, Miss Mary Thompson, and Mr. Florence Peel.

Among pen-and-ink drawings and etchings we must particularize the pointed and effective "Scenes from the Life of a Governess," and the sketches of character by Miss Sutherland, Miss Mary Thompson, and the clever and doubtless authentic version of "The Constitutional" by Miss Ellen Edwards. Miss Edwards also sends a clever illustration of Clarion; the illustrations to Tennyson, &c., by the Misses Taylor; and a number of sketches by Miss Charlotte Babb. A miniature of "Angela," by Miss Annie Howard, is much admired.

The dignity of plastic art is worthily upheld by the distinguished sculptor, Miss Durham, who sends a statuette group, and a bas-relief, incidents relating to Achilles and his mother, Thetis. It is more than creative, also, indeed, to think that Miss Durham has produced a second nearly over one of the most difficult modes of artistic expression that the fine arts afford. The modelling of these compositions are less apparent in the conventions and inevitable foreshortenings of the same passages on the same plane with the spectator. Au reste, these bas-reliefs have striking merits of conception and composition.

Mr. Sant, A.R.A., has just completed a religious picture, now exhibiting at the gallery of Mr. Paul and Co., which is the most important work of the kind the artist has produced. The subject represented is the Virgin and Child surrounded by angels, and the Virgin and their journey to Emmaus. The disciples have not yet been permitted to recognise Christ. There is either indicated that they are still "constrained," or that the Saviour's features, like Moses', are not inclined in an attitude of profound reflection, and Cleopas, by a process of the artist's own invention, is represented as in the act of saying that the attitudes are intended to express the humility of newly-born faith, and the angels are represented as descending carrying conviction to the mind of the other. Judging from the word quoted on the frame beneath the picture, this alone is certainly the meaning intended by the artist. The angels have communicated the news of the Saviour's death to the supposed stranger, by reminding him of the words of the prophets, and of what "the prophets have spoken." Christ looks upwards with a rather ambiguous expression, while other angels exhibit the illumined simply as a work of art, these uncertainties, arising from the elaborate ideas sought to be expressed, and the want of the direct meaning a more unaffected treatment of the subject would have brought with it. It will be suggestive to a Christian mind only because he will bring to it so much knowledge of what he has been taught to believe. Looked at as this subject has been so seldom attempted. In trying to force the meaning Mr. Sant has sometimes sacrificed truth to over-refinement of attitudes. We need hardly say the great exaggeration in the several qualities—rich colour, bold effect, and dashing handling; but those technicalities are the natural and necessary accompaniments of such a work, and seem to take the place of the very deepest thought and feeling of which the artist is capable, and which he has expressed. Nevertheless, the picture is remarkable as among the few tolerably satisfactory representations of our present school. The work is to be engraved by Mr. Samuel Bellin.

Mr. Cropsey, the American landscape-painter, whose picture, "Autumn on the Hudson," was the chief attraction of the American gallery in the International Exhibition, has painted a picture which is exhibiting in the gallery of Messrs. Agnew, and is a fine companion to that work. The actual title is "Autumn on the Delaware, 1862," and the picture represents the lovely view from that beautiful river's banks, which, in the autumn season, must have been passed for its purely English beauty, and therefore, perhaps, more highly appreciated by Continental visitors than by ourselves. The picture has very considerable merit. Its chief technical drawback is the hotness and crudity of the colour. The foliage in shadow is, in particular, of unnatural hues of cool green. This will, however, not affect the engraving from this work, which, we understand, is to be made by Mr. Wallis. The picture may be seen at Mr. Graves's, Pall-mall.

The following statues will shortly be placed in the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion House, in continuation of the series already erected—viz., "Alexander the Great," by Mr. Theed; "Alfred," by Mr. Stephens; "I Penseroso," by Mr. Hancock; "Shakspeare," by Mr. Bailey, R.A.; "Milton," by Mr. Calder Fairbut "Shepherdess," from Beaumont and Fletcher, by Miss Durant.

THE FARM.

THE recent cattle-salutation lecture at Professor Voelcker has helped to concentrate the floating experience on the subject of malt-feeding. The Professor seems to consider that it proves of most use as a digestive when cattle are highly fed. "It is not milk," he observes, "the sugar in the malt which acts usefully; but it has also the peculiar property of changing the starch in barley-meal rapidly into sugar." Among those who formed the deputation to Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Booth spoke strongly as to the economy in "feeding animals up to fattop condition," from his knowledge of its long use at Warsaby and Killerby; and added that the prize Leicesters at the last Yorkshire show were all malt-fed animals. According to the former lecture, with malting expenses added, would average £8 per ton; while the present adulterated linseed cake costs £10. Mr. Fisher Hobbs and Mr. Williams, of Bayham, also testified to its effects on sheep and lambs. Mr. Hobbs said that the two-year-old wethers, thus respecting the drawback allowed to the foreigner, and similarly favourable terms as a rival feeder. As we have always maintained, this is the only way in which the duty is likely to be attacked, and on which a Chancellor is likely to be "squeasable," provided the feeding can be carried out on a large scale, and the "get his guard up" against the frauds to which the malt-trade might give rise. As regards the best part of the question, the hypothesis that the labouring man would be far less likely to get drunk under the "good old sheep" system, and would stay at home in the evenings, drinking the produce of his own brewing-kettle and never sighing for the Chequers or Red Lion, seems as purely Arcadian as the notion that a Chancellor would ever take off the House and Malt tax with such a popular and fruitful tax in toto.

There were more than horses at Hoveden Fair, and many a same away without making a single purchase, and with the old story that one early bird had been round before the fair and picked up every good worker. The Irish agents were there in great force, and bought up troop-horses at remunerative rates to the breeders.

The shorthorn lots to be offered on Wednesday week next by Mr. Wetherall comprise the celebrated Duke of Oxford tribe, as well as the stem from Bell's Weekly Messenger that several calves have been recently disposed of. The Duke has been quite a favourite of the world "in hard matters; and he and his sire have bailiff, Mr. Dodds, have been bound by no "pure Booth or Bates" fetters, but bought whatever was good in the neighbourhood, and were always ready to do so older. The Rose Duchess tribe numbers five; Cassandra has two Miss Daughters, Young Duchess, Duchess Lass, and Duchess of Cherry Cheeks and Chief Baron; but, except Rose of Sharon, all are descended from the old Duchess notorious as the mother of the Woodcote tribe. M'Turk, by Grand Turk from Lally, is the sire of the Duke tots, and Gumester is the chief among five by Prince Tallyrand.

NEW BRUNSWICK.

MANUKAU HARBOUR, AUCKLAND.

We this week present our readers with an Engraving of Manukau Harbour, Auckland, in attempting to enter which the ill-fated Orpheus was so lately wrecked. The view is taken from a drawing by Major F. R. Stack, late Brigade-Major at Auckland, was obtained from a range of hills, about four miles from the entrance, and gives a fair idea of Auckland withone overlooking the entrance to the harbour, which is marked in the centre of the picture by a group of low bluffs, which are very conspicuous and impose objects when approached from the sea. These are called the Manukau Heads, and between them is the narrow channel which leads to the inner harbour. The Manukau, towards which and the mouth of the harbour the steamer seen in our Engraving is steering, is a fine navigable passage, for large vessels or sailing inwards to the port of Onehunga, which is situated about seven miles to the left of the Engraving.

WAR EMISSARIES FROM THE KING OF ASHANTEE TO GOVERNOR PINE, OF THE GOLD COAST.

We present our readers with an Engraving taken from a photograph by Mr. Debes, of the extraordinary and barbaric deputation which lately waited upon his Excellency Governor Pine, of the Gold Coast, from the King of Ashantee. The object was to demand many other causes of disturbance on the West Coast of Africa—a misunderstanding has arisen between Cancoma, the king of which is a British Government, which may, it is feared, lead to serious consequences. The cause of the quarrel is stated to be as follows—It is the custom that all rock gold (or gold in nuggets) found in the territory of Ashantee should belong to the King, gold dust only being retained by his subjects. A certain chief was suspected of having retained some rock gold, and was ordered by the King to present himself at Kumassie (the capital). But apprehensive, not unnaturally, of danger, the chief, with some hundreds of his followers, fled to the town of Denkerah, which is inhabited by a tribe who revolted from Ashantee some years ago, and are now under British protection. The King of Ashantee thereupon sent a chief (his war-axe bearer) and other messengers to Governor Pine, at Cape Coast Castle, demanding that the absconding chief should be delivered to him, and threatening war in case of a refusal. He based his claim upon a pretended treaty alleged to have been made some time back providing for the extradition of rebels against his rule. No such treaty could, however, be discovered in the archives of the colony, and the Governor, having good reason to believe that the offending chief would be put to death, refused to surrender him unless the King would produce the treaty he referred to or send witnesses to prove that the chief was a malefactor and had offended against the laws. These conditions have not been complied with, and hostilities may at any moment be expected to break out. The Governor's decision has met with the approval of the inhabitants living under British protection, although the King of Ashantee is said to have a very strong force of fighting-men under his command and there is but a handful of British troops available for service against him.

In further explanation of our Engraving, it should be mentioned that it is customary with the Kings of Ashantee, previous to declaring war, to send the reigning Monarch's war-axe bearer, with messengers bearing a barrel of gunpowder and a nugget of gold. The centre of the three prominent figures in our Engraving is the axe-bearer, the others being famous warriors. The group was photographed inside Cape Coast Castle.

THE MONDAY EVENING POPULAR CONCERTS: THE INSTRUMENTALISTS.

THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The above Engraving contains the portraits of the instrumental performers who have mainly contributed by their talents to the success of the above admirable and truly popular entertainments. Our musical readers will easily recognise the individuals who compose the group. First, there is Mr. Arthur Chappell, of the eminent firm of Chappell and Co., New Bond-street, the founder and director of the concerts, whose judicious management has rendered them so prosperous. The performers are:—M. Sainton, who, though a native of France, may, through his residence among us of more than twenty years, be almost claimed as one of our own artists; Herr Joachim, now Kapellmeister to the King of Hanover, who, though still a young man, is one of the greatest Continental violinists of the day; Signor Piatti, the finest performer on the violoncello who has been heard in England since the days of the celebrated Robert Lindley; Mdme. Arabella Goddard (Mrs. J. W. Davison), a young and charming lady, who has no superior among the great female pianists of the day; Mr. Charles Hallé, a pianist of the highest order, and for many years director of the Manchester Concerts; Mr. Benedict, the favourite pupil of Weber, who, during a residence in England of more than a quarter of a century, has distinguished himself in the highest branches of his art, especially in the musical drama—his operas of "The Gipsy's Warning" and "The Lily of Killarney" having acquired a European celebrity; Mr. Lindsay Sloper, a musician of high reputation, both as a composer of genius and as an excellent performer on the pianoforte; Mr. Blagrove and Mr. Webb—the one a violinist, the other a tenor-player—gentlemen who do not come before the public as solo performers, but who are well known in our musical world as quartet-players of the utmost finish and refinement, and whose talents have greatly contributed to the excellence of the Monday Popular Concerts.

THE SEA OF GALILEE.

We have already given a short notice of the excursus at the Haymarket Theatre representing the principal scenes and sites visited by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales during his tour in the East. We need only remind the reader that the panorama is accompanied by a farcical little piece written by Mr. Birding Coyne and entitled "Mr. Buckstone at Home," that is exhibited from a most convenient subdivision to the dramatic entertainment of the evening, and is likely to meet with long-continued public favour. The panorama pictures have been painted by Mr. William Tolbin, assisted by Mr. Henry Telbin, who, we are informed in the catalogue, "undertook a journey to the East expressly to secure a degree of fidelity not hitherto to be met with works of this nature." Mr. Telbin, senr., has long been known as an admirable assistant-painter; but his progress of late years, and the result everything we have seen in the nature of a panorama, are surpassed by these recent landscapes by open-air sketches from which they emanate be considered. They convey the impression of considerable artistic merit and great accuracy, and the artistical light under which they are exhibited, and for the effect of which they are especially calculated, lend them an arid vividness which must be a closer resemblance to the burning and blinding Oriental sunshine than could be given by any means. We have selected one of the scenes for our Engraving. It is a view of the Sea of Galilee (connected as closely as the Jordan with our ministry), looking south-west from the highest point of the Castle of Safed, which, like the town, was crumbled almost to dust by an earthquake. In the extreme distance are the mountains of Ajlun, following the course of the Jordan on to the Dead Sea. At the farther point of the land, on the right-hand shore, is the town of Tiberias. On the point nearer the spectator, on the same side, is the village of Magdala. Still nearer, under the cliffs and conveyed by a rough path, is the place where Capernaum once stood, and part of the flat, on the margin of the sea, known by the name of Gennesareth. Safed, in the foreground, is one of the holy places of the Jews, many of whom resort to it from all parts of the world to end their days; and a more solemn, forlorn, eyeball—not to say dirty—set of melancholy ghosts it would be difficult to find.

MUSIC.

The representation, at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, of "Lucia di Lammermoor" on Tuesday last was the first that has been given ever without. In the character of Walter Scott's most interesting heroine, Mdlle. Titiens combines the powers of the greatest vocalist living with the duties of a tragedian of the highest order. In the scenes where the unhappy girl receives from her cruel brother the fabricated evidence of her lover's falsehood—where she signs the fatal "contract"—where she is overwhelmed by the sudden appearance of the infuriated Sir Edgar—her acting was the perfection of natural truth and feeling; and in the closing scene of despair and madness she was more successful in giving dramatic truth of expression to the florid and difficult music than any performer we remember to have seen who made the attempt. Giuglini, too, achieved a triumph in the character of Edgardo. His appealing cry in the "Malediction" was given with a striking contrast to the softness and tenderness of his dying accents in the exquisite "Tu piango." Gassier was an admirable representative of the stern and hard-hearted brother; and Boss gave due importance to the small but effective part of the good clergyman. The new ballet "Le Paradis," a "mighty grand" affair, as it ought to be, is a very exhibition of dancing, and enables Mdlle. Ferraris to display her charms and graces to the greatest advantage. M. Jullien has, too, a handsome man, and a dancer of remarkable agility. But if the piece has any dramatic design or meaning, no such thing is apparent to the audience, who are not enlightened by any "argument" descriptive of the subject and incidents, as used to be the custom in the old days of the ballet at Her Majesty's Theatre.

At the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, "Guglielmo Tell" was produced on Thursday for the first time this season, when Signor Ciaffei (one of Mr. Gye's new recruits) made his début as Gessler (Archaduke) of Arnold. Of his appearance, and the performance of this most splendid opera, we shall give some account next week.

The third concert of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY took place at the Hanover square Rooms on Monday evening last. It was honoured with the presence of their Royal Highnesses Prince Alfred and Princess Helena and Louisa. They were attended by a numerous suite, and the room was crowded by a brilliant assemblage. The following was the programme of the concert:—

PART I.
Recit. ed Aria, "Ecco mostro," &c. Mr. Santley
"Le Nozze di Figaro."
Concerto in E flat, pianoforte, Mr. W. G. Cusins	Mozart.
Recit. ed Aria, from an early manuscript, "Ah perfido," Scena "Ocean," Overture "Coriolan"	Beethoven.
PART II.
Sinfonia in A major, composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society	Mendelssohn.
Duet, Mdlle. Parepa and Mr. Santley ("Rigoletto")	Verdi.
Overture "Der Freischütz"	Weber.

The symphonies of Mozart and Mendelssohn, Beethoven's unrivalled overture to "Coriolan," and Weber's "Der Freischütz" were performed in a manner which showed the power of the noble orchestra under the direction of their able conductor (Sir Sterndale Bennett). Weber's concerto, a work comparatively little known, yet one of the author's finest compositions, was played by Mr. Cusins in a manner which did him high honour, and called forth great pleasure to the audience. Mr. Cusins is an accomplished pianist; he has a full and powerful tone, clear and brilliant execution, and he possesses the highest quality of a performer; the art of singing on his instrument. The beautiful adagio movement in E flat, where the melody and expression of vocal music. He was deservedly and warmly applauded. The vocal pieces corresponded in excellence with the instrumental portion of the concert. Signor Belletti's delivery of the fine scena from "Figaro" was a masterly specimen of style and expression; Mdlle. Parepa gave the recitative and "Ocean, thou mighty monster," with extraordinary vocal and declamatory power; and the duet from "Rigoletto," one of the best things in that fine opera, was sung with great dramatic effect. This concert, in short, did as much credit to the direction of the society for the taste and judgment of the selection as to the performers for the excellent execution of the whole of the music.

At the concert of the VOCAL ASSOCIATION, on Tuesday evening, the principal feature of the programme was the operetta, "The Sons of Sidney," composed by Mr. Chalmers Masters, which, on musical reading may commend itself to us as a novelty as yet unbrished work. On this occasion it was performed for the first time, and its effect fully confirmed the opinion we had formed from the perusal. The solos were extremely well sung by Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Tennant, and Mr. Weiss; most of them were encored, and the whole piece was justly and warmly applauded.

Herr Pauer, the distinguished pianist, has commenced a repetition of his "Historical Performances of Pianoforte Music," which excited so much interest last season. They are six in number, and are given at Willis's Rooms. The first took place on Monday last, the 14th inst. It consisted of works of the Academy at Vienna school, and included choice specimens of the great masters of that school from Frohberger, who flourished in the seventeenth century, to the modern Liszt and Thalberg. The second, on Monday next, will include the Italian school of the second school of Clementi; and the subsequent performances will be devoted, in due chronological order, to Bach and his family, and to the principal masters of the French and English schools. As Herr Pauer is not only one of the most accomplished performers of the day, but is thoroughly conversant with the whole range of music for the piano and the keyed instruments which preceded it, these performances not only form a delightful entertainment, but are full of interest and instruction. For each performance there is an accompanying book of analytical remarks, biographical notices, historical sketches, and other appropriate topics, written with singular ability, and full of interest for every lover of music.

It is said that Mr. Charles Dickens has engaged by Mr. G. W. Martin for the five remaining oratorio performances of the National Choral Society this season at Exeter Hall, and for the whole of the next season, the terms being fifty guineas for each performance.

A very interesting concert was given at the OPERA COMIQUE, Paris, on Saturday last, for the benefit of the grandchildren of the celebrated Kreasan, the father of dramatic music in France. The company of the Gymnase (including Mdme. Rose Chéri) performed "Les Deux Mots," "Le Chapeau d'un Horloger," and "L'Avocat Patholin." The musical part of the entertainment consisted of the last act of "Tarare," followed by a miscellaneous concert. The principal vocal performers were Mdme. Gueymard, Mdme. Wertheimber, and Mdlle. Lefebvre. The violin and the piano were played by M. Vieuxtemps and Mdme. Kastner. The concert included some specimens of the old French worthy. The theatre was crowded and the receipts large.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.—It is now rarely that a London audience can command the chair of acting of which Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wigan are the representatives. With us, when actors have cultivated their powers of observation, they are apt to be like astronomers, like the planets, take to wandering. They visit the provinces, and shed their light on the country boors, and when they are to be found anywhere for a season or so. When they return, after long intervals, they appear in their old familiar nooks and fixed stars, not unfrequently under the old familiar masks and faces. We venture to think that this system wants alteration, and that the public would not find it to their disadvantage if deprived of its best actors. Indeed, we know no better reason for augmenting the number of theatres than this fact; and we should consider it highly beneficial which may make room, or create a need, for the employment of our best performers. We have said this much in order to record that Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wigan reappeared on Monday at "the Little Theatre" in the Haymarket, and that Mr. Wigan's performance of the part of Mr. Tangent was perfect. How well suited the part of John Mildmay is to the special aptitudes of Mr. Wigan as an actor we need not now enter into, considering the high state of public opinion on that question. The character itself is a clever stage representation of the quiet, unemonstrative gentleman we sometimes meet with, who, with little apparent impulse, only want the stimulus of a sufficient cause to show tremendous energy of character, and an effective execution. What we allude to forms an affecting incident in the career of a convict woman, who, after years of penal servitude, is accompanied to her home at the Strand, and lately at the St. James's, died on Wednesday week. The previous evening, when the poor creature's relatives had left her, and when her arrived at home in so exhausted a state that he was not able to undress himself, not able to take food or sight in a candle, he sat down by her bedside, with a faint smile to his wife, "The little raffle is over." Mr. James Rogers, of the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, died long been suffering from ill-health.—On the previous Monday night, Mr. Rogers, the actor known as "Old Kate" (from the name of the author of Jenny Wichfair, in Mr. Falconer's comedy "Married Couple"), entered on his fifty-seventh year of gravity in existence. Mr. Rogers was very thirty-six years of age. She was born of Quaker parents, and early in life acquired that knowledge of the world which, in 1852 she turned to such considerable practice as an actress. Her style was pointed and vivacious.

During the last quarter 72,720 persons left the ports of Ireland who stated to the enumerators that it was not their intention to return. Of this number 38,465 were males, and 34,255 females; the former exceeding the latter by 4,210. As regards the ages of the emigrants, 63·3 persons in every 100 were between the ages of 15 and 35, 16·1 under 15, and 20·6 above 35; and 61·7 in every 100 between the ages of 7 and 45.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

Or our greatest poet of the Middle Ages, Geoffrey Chaucer, little is positively known until the autumn of 1339, when he himself says he was in the army with which Edward III. invaded France, and that he served for the first time on that occasion. Such is the statement of the poet's latest biographer, Sir Harris Nicolas. Chaucer has himself told us that London was the place of his nativity; his biographers believe him to have been born in the City, but they have been a member of one of the companies; yet none of them have hitherto been able to discover his residence, save that in the "Liber Albus" in an entry of the year 1321 he is said to be "at the Gate of Aldgate) unto Geoffrey Chaucer;" and in the "Liber Custumarum" there appears an account of a wardship being granted to him. Chaucer's parents, John and Agnes Chaucer, were natives of the poet's paternal home and of the place of his birth has been added by Mr. W. H. Overall, of the Manuscript Department of the British Museum, Middlesex, and Surrey Archæological Societies at their recent monthly meeting on the 1st inst. The documents are a document dated "Richard II., being a transfer of premises from Chaucer to Herbury, situate in the parish of St. Martin's-in-the-Vintry, the name of which was described as "le Grete Tavern in Cornhull;" in front of "le Conduit," book i., sec. 5—"Also the cities of London, that is to me dere and swete, in which I was forth growen, and more kindely love I no place in no land, for there I took first mine knowing of worldly joy, next the grace that I have to come to the knowing of Jesu Christ, and eke the first gladness in holy suggendure, and to my soule ease and rest after this life is shapen." In a deed which followed the reading of the paper Mr. Butterworth, F.S.A., made some appropriate observations on Chaucer, and concluded by moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Overall for his valuable communication.

The banking-house of Messrs. Barclay and Co., No. 54, Lombard street, side of Gracechurch street, is to be unrestored shortly to be taken down and rebuilt. The old premises extend backwards to George-court, in which court they have been derived from the gift of Richard Mervaylle to the Vintners' Company, who leased the premises for seventy years, at a peppercorn rent, to Sir Thomas Gresham, 1578. At the expiration of that term they were sold by auction, and were bought in for a handsome sum by Sir Martin Bowes, who resided there. The house was afterwards occupied by Sir Peter Vanlore, and subsequently by Sir Thomas Cullum, Bart., who died in 1726. The premises were then described as between the tenement of William the Granger, towards the east, and the tenement which formerly belonged to John le Mazenyere towards the west, and extending to the King's highway of Thames-street, towards the south, as far as the Water of Walbrooke, to the north. Sir Thomas Cullum was a Turkey merchant, who is described as a vintner of London. From this deed the above premises appear to have been the father's residence; and that it is reasonably supposed, Chaucer was born and lived. His father being a vintner, he was born free of that craft. These facts are strengthened by the following passage in Chaucer's "Reve of Cote father as second Baron Oct. 9, 1830. His Lordship was married, on the 5th of October, 1814, Mary, daughter of Vice-Admiral Lechmere, of Steeple Aston, in Warwickshire, and issue of Sir John Lechmere-Kedge, Bart., of West Wycombe, Buckinghamshire, by which lady—who died in May, 1849 —he had no issue. Lord De Saumarez died at Christchurch, on the 8th inst., and is succeeded by his next surviving brother, John St. Vincent, now Lord Saumarez, a Colonel in the Army, who was born in 1826, and married, first, in 1850, Caroline Esther, eldest daughter of William Rhodes, Esq., of Kirkdill-hall and Bramley, Yorkshire, by whom (who died in 1846) he has had two sons and two daughters—Caroline, wife of Lord Rokeby, and Mary, wife of the Hon. F. W. Fitz Hardinge, son of Lord Boston. Lord De Saumarez married, secondly, in 1850, Margaret Antoinette, fourth daughter of the late W. H. Wyndham Quin, Esq., of Dromoland, Clare, Buckinghamshire, and by her has two sons, and two daughters. This old and honourable family of Saumarez, originally De Saumarez, has been extensively and of great antiquity in the Island of Guernsey, has been frequently distinguished in our naval annals, and is now of the Baronetage of the United Kingdom of Admiral Sir James Saumarez, which raised him to a baronetcy in 1801 and to the peerage of Saumarez in1831.

VICE-ADMIRAL G. W. C. COURTENAY.

G. W. Courtenay, Vice-Admiral of the Blue, who died on the 31st ult., at his residence, Albany, Piccadilly, aged seventy-seven, entered the Navy in March, 1800, under the auspices of Earl St. Vincent, and first served on board the Atheneon, commanded by the then Captain afterwards Admiral Sir Edward Pakenham. During the six years Courtenay remained with this vessel he saw much active service, and was present, on the capture, in 1805, after a severe action, of the flagship of the French 80-gun ship the Marengo and the famed Belle Poule frigate. He next joined the Victory, Admiral Lord Nelson's flagship during his lieutenancy, in 1813, he served in the Crescent, the San Josef, and seventy-four gun ship. In 1823 Courtenay commanded the boats of the Cyrene, and displayed great courage and judgment at the destruction of numerous piratical craft, and received the thanks of the Admiralty. He became for some months senior officer at Mexico. After this he for a time had the best temporary command of the Crescent during the Ashantee war. He afterwards, while commanding the Race, rescued 200 slaves from slavers, with 78 slaves on board. He was made Post-Captain in 1828, in the Magnificent, receiving-ship, at Jamaica. In the following year he became in command of the Mursey, when he returned to England. He became a Vice-Admiral of the Blue in 1861.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JAMES POOLE OATES, R.H.

Lieutenant-Colonel James Poole Oates, R.H., who expired at his house, 6, Lindsay-grove, Kensington, on the 6th inst., at the advanced age of ninety-five, entered the British army on the 1st of March, 1797. For eight years he was actively employed in the West Indies. At Cape Nicholas Mole he was severely wounded in the right side by a musket-ball, and, in an attack near Port au Prince, in the following year, he received a sabre cut on the left hand. He went to Egypt, and crossed the Desert under Sir David Baird. He next attended the expedition to South America in 1807, and was afterwards employed against the whole of the Peninsular War, and was severely wounded on the head by the bursting of a shell during the battle of Talavera. He was present at the storming of Port Florinus; and once more through the right thigh at Orthes. He obtained the rank of Major on the 21st of July, 1825, and that of Lieutenant-Colonel on the 22nd of July, 1830. He had received the gold medal for his services in Egypt, and the silver war medal with two clasps.

THE REV. EDWARD STOKES, M.A.

The Rev. Edward Stokes, M.A., Vicar of Staines, and Rural Dean, for many years Rector and Vicar of Chard, Somersetshire, died suddenly on the 15th inst., of disease of the heart, which had been long threatening. The deceased, who was born in 1800, was the son of Mr. Stokes, of Ashford, Middlesex, and was educated at Eton and Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1823, and M.A. in 1826. He was ordained in 1824, and was for some time curate of Ashford, Middlesex. In 1829 he was presented to the living of Whitchurch, Devon, by Mr. Templer, of Whitchurch House, and resigned it in 1836, on being appointed by the Crown to the Rectory of Chard, Somersetshire. He was also Rural Dean of Chard, and Chaplain to the Chard Union. He was a Magistrate for the county of Somerset, and was a Deputy-Lieutenant for the county of Devon. He was also a Governor of Blundell's School, Tiverton, and of the Grammar School, Chard. He was a Trustee of the Chard Charities, and was Chairman of the Chard Gas Company. He was also a Trustee of the Chard Savings Bank, and was Chairman of the Chard Savings Bank Committee. He was also

DINNERS FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.

ALTHOUGH an exclusive and meticulous "patronage" of the working classes, in teaching them how to live and what to live upon, has been recently, and with some show of reason, deprecated as productive only of irritation in the first instance, and at last of resentment and disgust, among the very persons whom such "patronage" is designed to benefit, it would be idle to deny that in the one article of succulent and nourishing food a deplorable amount of ignorance prevails among those who stand most in need of abundant and wholesome sustenance. We are not prepared to maintain that a system of culinary education much superior in degree is to be found in the middle or even in the upper ranks of the community. Scarcely one person in ten thousand really consumes the right thing in the right place, or entertains rational ideas of what he should "eat, drink, and avoid." The affluent begin their dinner with swallowing melted butter in the form of "white soup," and end it with cream ice, and then wonder the next morning that they suffer from heartburn. With a commendable desire to avoid the tabular excesses which disgraced the last century, they sip claret or iced seltzer water at the moment when the stomach is least prepared for the reception of such beverages, and are then astounded at being martyrs to dyspepsia. Some medical men disdain to be considered as colleagues of the cook, while other doctors differ fiercely as to diet. But with the working man—whose stomach is in good condition, whose digestion is unimpaired, and whose taste is not so elegantly depraved as to make him think melon with roast lamb orthodox, and sardines or cod-sounds before dinner a luxury—the chief culinary difficulty is to get anything like good food, properly cooked, and at a cheap rate. The English workman, with much higher wages, is infinitely worse fed than the French ouvrier. He may devour more animal food in the course of the year, but it does not do him so much good as the savoury and digestible pot au feu. The converse is the case with the French soldier, whose daily pay is much inferior to that of the Englishman, but the ordinary of whose gamelle is far more appetising than the bill-of-fare of a British barrack Some improvements have been made in this respect of late years, and at Aldershott there is now a "military Instructor of Cookery;" but during the Crimean War, while the English guardsman, in sheer ignorance, would be drinking green coffee or burning over the bivouac-fire a lump of ration pork stuck on the point of a bayonet, the Frenchman would come over from Kamiesch to beg the scraps of meat which his allies threw away as offal, and convert them into relishing stews and ragouts. In summing up the corporeal pabulum of the British workman, it is necessary to inquire what he can procure to eat in his own home and what out of doors. We will take the last first. If he choose to be his own purveyor he may go to a low-class butcher's and buy a piece of steak, or to the cheesemonger's and obtain a slice of bacon, or to the porkbutcher's and provide himself with half a pound of pork or beef sausages. These aliments he takes, raw, to the tavern which is his house of call. There, for a trifling fee, he has the freedom of the taproom, the use of a fryingpan or gridiron, the salt-box, the pepper-castor, and the mustard-pot. Here, too, he is expected to drink his beer for "the good of the house," and here he may smoke his pipe. He cooks his food—steak, bacon, or sausages,—as clumsily or as deftly as may be; and he dines without a tablecloth, without attendance, and in the midst of an atmosphere of tobacco-smoke. We will say nothing of the incitements to idleness, drunkenness, and gaming which are to be found at the "house of call"—chance companions, loose converse, perilous facilities of credit for ardent liquors, cribbage and bagatelle-boards, and the like—because the majority of workmen are steady and industrious, and would as soon think of robbing their masters as of overstaying their dinner-hour. But the bare and uncomfortable meal remains unchanged; of vegetables or pudding the workman does not venture to dream. There is no time to cook them. In Let weather the salad and cucumbers exposed on the street stalls may make his mouth water; but undressed salad is not very nice, and the publican would stare if he were asked for oil, vinegar, and a hard-boiled egg. Now, let us suppose that the workman dislikes public-houses, and elects to dine at a cookshop. There are hundreds of these establishments in the poorer districts of London, where a variety of roast and boiled meats, vegetables, puddings, tarts, and even hashes and soups, are dispensed at rates varying from fourpence for a portion of animal food to a penny a plate for greens, potatoes, or pudding. At all events, a workman can dine at a cookshop, including half a pint of beer sold on the premises, for sevenpence. Then, again, there are numerous places specially affected to the sale of damaged beef—a very savoury, plutuous stew—and of hot-pot soup sold in three-penny, fourpenny, and sixpenny basins. There are other shops driving a large trade solely in "pennorths" of suet, currant, and baked Yorkshire pudding. The chief objections, however, against all these shops lie in their being dirty and in not unfrequently having no public-houses—in the seantiness of sitting accommodation,—in the inferior quality of the provisions and the mediocrity of the cooking. One pervading flavour, that of pork gravy, is omnipresent both in meat, vegetables, and pudding; and the odour of the joints undergoing in their pans a more sickening than that of the tobacco fumes at the public-house. Let us now follow the workman to his home. His case here is even worse than out of doors. The chances are a hundred to one against his wife being able to cook at all. It is almost to be regretted, but it is nevertheless certain, that although a vast proportion of the wives of workmen have been in domestic service, the number is comparatively infinitesimal of those who can even boil a potato or broil a steak. All the schools and asylums, the orphanages and reformatories whose girls are educated, seem powerless to turn out commonly decent cooks. The children of the working man live chiefly on bread and butter or ill-made puddings. On the one day of the week on which, as a rule, the fraudwinner dines at home—Sunday—there is one staple and almost unvarying piece of cookery. A hot of beef—flank, or the tops of the ribs—has been bought at the butcher's. This is crammed into a dish with some half-scraped potatoes or lumpy batter beneath it, and sent to the bakehouse. The result is that the workman grows so nauseated with incessant baked beef as the soldier and the sailor grow with incessant boiled. Even the stomach of an epicure revolts at toujours perdrix. There is an old axiom to the effect that "Beef makes boys;" but an acute farmer, who fed his labourers from year's end to year's end on this potent food was unanswerable to say that "Beef and nothing but beef would break a ploughman's heart."

To remedy an acknowledged evil, the last two or three years have been fertile in schemes for ameliorating the menu of the working man's dinner-table. The initiative in this praiseworthy movement was due to an unmarried lady—Miss Isely—the daughter, we believe, of the author of "Vanity Fair"—who, in an article in the Cornhill Magazine, called "The Poor Man's Kitchen," drew attention to the comfortless nature of the workman's fare, and suggested how, by the application of a little scientific knowledge and a little economic energy, it might be, if not regenerated, at least improved. The hint thus thrown out has borne good fruit. In Glasgow a very sensible and practical plan for providing working men's dinners was matured, and has been for a considerable period in flourishing operation. The penny ration has been replaced by the penny restaurant system." The bill of fare comprises meat, plain soup, collops, potatoes, pudding, porridge, coffee, bread and butter, but nothing costs more than a penny. Of animal food the rations are exceedingly diminutive, but they are wonderfully cheap, and every article supplied is of the very best description. The provisions are consumed on the premises; the dining-rooms are clean, spacious, and cheerful; and, we believe, no fermented liquors are allowed to be sold. It was natural that so excellent and successful an undertaking should find a wider sphere of action, and accordingly we find that an independent organisation on an analogous but modified basis has arisen in London, with fair chances of a prosperous issue. The London association for providing restaurants for the working classes have gone on the assumption that the bill of fare will have to be somewhat restricted for the cosmopolitan taste of the metropolis, and the carte is therefore varied by such dishes as "carried trips," "pekets," "Jullienne soup," "Warriner's mixture sandwiches," "Indian pudding," "toad in the hole," fish, &c. An especially fine dinner, comprising all those varieties, was given, or two Lent at the Colonnade Working Man's Club, in Clare-market, and was attended by numerous influential persons and by several of the London clergy; notably by the Rev. Mr. Kilpack, the Rector of St. Clement Danes, one of the most active and energetic of metropolitan incumbents, and who for some time past has been successfully trying the experiment of providing cheap dinners "from the joint" for the very poor at the Mission House in Clement's-lane, more, however, as a charitable enterprise than as a commercial investment. These, again, Messrs. Gurney and Kinnaird, the well-known philanthropists, have organised a cheap restaurant in one of the most crowded parts of Whitechapel. On the whole, the movement, though little more than nascent, is progressing, and bids fair to assume satisfactory dimensions.

It is no part of our duty to enact the part of the shepherd of Mount Ida, or to award the golden apple of superiority to any one particular scheme for working men's restaurants which may be laid before us. We have said enough, we hope, to show that a widely-extended system of cheap dining rooms is urgently needed; but we are not blind to the difficulties which encounter, their formation. In the first place, the idea that the classes provided stood in any way of the light of a charitable debt would be fatal to the movement. For this reason we should deprecate any endeavours to obtain subscriptions or donations towards the erection of restaurants for the people. Every such establishment should be essentially self-supporting, and the working men should be able to feel that they were the "patrons" and not the "patronised" in the matter. If any other plan than this be adopted, or even hinted at, the restaurants will be degraded to the rank of soup kitchens and refuges for the destitute. It may be asked, if assistance from the wealthy and charitable be repudiated, how a long-required measure of culinary reform among those whose lot it is to labour is to be accomplished? We answer, by self-help. But will working men help their hands in such a channel? We reply, why not? In the lowest, filthiest, most poverty-stricken districts of London capitalists are every day found ready to lay out thousands of pounds in the erections of temples dedicated to the worship of Bacchus. Plate glass, Corinthian columns, painted ceilings, gilding, mirrors, mahogany, rosewood, chandeliers, and enamelled tiles are not spared. The gin palaces of London are splendid, if tasteless; and on the sale of what do they subsist do and their proprietors realise large incomes? On penny ratios of intoxicating liquors, on half-pints of porter and penny worths of gin. The poor flock to them, not only because they can procure stimulants, but because the houses where those stimulants are retailed are spacious, comfortable, handsome, and brilliantly lighted. The cruising cookshops are usually dirty, ill-ventilated, dingy, comparatively dear. The reason is obvious: their proprietors are mainly persons of small capital, or of no capital at all. They buy at a dear rate, and they are obliged to sell at a dear one. But we see no reason why capitalists should not devote to the erection and maintenance of restaurants those funds which they have hitherto expended on gin-palaces. There is no need for working men's restaurants to be bare, whitewashed, cheerless-looking places, governed by a kind of workhouse discipline. The world loves them fair and scrupulous dealing. Let it be the same time comfortably furnished and brilliantly decorated. There are scene-painters in plenty to make cheap theatres, cheap casinos, and cheap music-halls inviting to the eye; why should they not try their pencils on cheap dining-rooms? The working man would spend a few pence more, and would only be strictly necessaire, but by comfort and comparative luxury. Restaurants established on such a plan, with a pleasant variety of dishes dispensed at the lowest possible rate compatible with a fair return, would not only be an investmable boon to the industrial classes, but a successful yield in the long run a handsome profit to the promoters.

The Royal Academy Exhibition in favour of Ireland was held in St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening. The hall was filled. Professor Bessly presided. Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli sent messages of sympathy to Erin. Erin in regard to Poland, and expressive of sympathy with that unhappy country.

The collection of finished pictures and sketches of the American artist, Mr. J. J. Cropsey, illustrating the grand and beautiful scenery in America, is well worth a visit in other respects besides its all 57 finished works, including his last fine landscape, "Richmond Hill," was on Wednesday week sold by Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods for 1,000 guineas.

The committee appointed to manage the financial part of the testimonial to the late Mr. Spurgeon met on Tuesday at the Mansion-house last week to her Royal Highness, met on Thursday week to make up their accounts, when it was found that the sum subscribed was £12,000. The meeting in connection with the Royal marriage will be close on £30,000. This is to be invested in Consols, and the interest paid to Mrs. Spurgeon for life.

The annual meeting of the Bible Translation Society was held on Monday evening, Sir Sugden Scarlett, said that according to the Rev. Joshua Russell, "there are several missions, both of the Gospels and of the Old Testament, in other languages, which are waiting for publication. The balance-sheet showed the receipts for the year to have been £1819, and the expenditure £1,000, leaving a funds of the same amount.

The one hundred and fifth annual meeting of the governors of the Orphan Working School (Haverstock-hill) charity was held yesterday week, at the Mansion-house, when there were present the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and ten girls. Mr. John Broughton Mills, M.P., presided. The report stated that the number of children in the school was now 300, and would be raised to 327. The ordinary receipts of the year were given at £7300. The extraordinary receipts were £1,000, and the total £8,300. The expenditure £8,000.

The anniversary festival of the supporters of St. Mark's Hospital for Fistula and other Diseases of the Rectum, which commenced to prosper, the committee having been enabled not only to discharge half the debt, but to add £1,000 to the building fund, was held on Wednesday last thirty. There are, however, wanting twenty more beds to constitute the hospital on the scale of usefulness originally designed, and the committee are unwilling to borrow £700 and £800 were announced during the evening.

The annual meeting of the Baptist Home Missionary Society was held on Monday evening at Exeter Hall, Strand, the Rev. J. C. Harrison presided, and there were about 2000 persons present. Mr. J. C. Marshman presided. The report stated that the receipts for the year had been £15,000 odd pounds. The number of additions by baptism during the year is 417—an average of 8 additions per week. The total number of members in the churches, added, now teachers, and 8781 scholars. The total income for the year was £1700.

Yesterday week the births of 1963 children—958 boys and 1005 girls—were registered in London. In the corresponding week of the years 1870-74 the average number (corrected) was 1961. The mortality of London is still somewhat above the average, and exceeded last February. The number of deaths last week showed only decrease on the return of the previous week. The average number of deaths in the corresponding week of the years 1870-74 was 1,344, but the number registered was 1,344, the increasing population, was 1286. A woman died from typhus at 7, Tower-place, Poplar, and 2 from the same disease in Whitechapel. The Archbishop of York has consented to preside at the annual meeting of the Association for the Relief of Jewish Widows and Orphans, which is to take place at St. James's Hall on the 11th inst.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Southport Pier, which is now nearly a mile long, is to be extended 500 yards.

Much damage was done in the North Riding on Tuesday evening by a severe thunder and hail storm.

Lord Masserecree has at length succumbed to the fear of injuries which he sustained some days ago. He died on Tuesday night.

Mr. P. Green Price, a Liberal-Conservative, was on Saturday elected, without opposition, for the Radnor Boroughs, the seat held by the Rt. Hon. W. O. Clough.

The Russian Government has established a Vice-Consulate in Manchester, and has appointed Mr. Loventa Tides, of the firm of Loventa and Co., Mount-street, Lee Vice-Consul.

The ceremony of turning the first sod of the Bognor Railway was performed by Mrs. Arnold, on Saturday last, at Bognor, in the presence of the leading gentry of the neighbourhood.

Eight silver watches have been recently found in a pond at Paddy Breary, by a labourer named Holland, and they have since been identified as a portion of nearly 200 watches stolen from Mr. Henry Grant, at Hebden Bridge, on the 24th ult.

The exodus from Lancashire to our colonies has begun in earnest. On Thursday two more emigrants' trains left Rochdale, Sacksteet, and other ten, to left by a body for Liverpool, to embark for New Zealand, and others are ready to leave for Victoria.

The first sod of the Horsham, Dorking, and Leatherhead Railway was turned on Saturday last, at Horsham, by Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, M.P. A large number of the leading gentlemen of the district interested in the undertaking were present. The line is intended to form another route to Brighton.

The rather unusual act of conflicating to the Crown the goods of a person convicted of felony has recently been carried out in Dublin. It was a case of reprisals. The indictment charged the prisoner with illegally receiving four yards of linen, the property of certain persons unknown, and the prisoner's solicitor brought an action to retain for the prisoner all save the value of the linen, the indictment. A warrant of confiscation was therefore applied for and obtained by the prosecution.

A Masonic ball, which was projected with the combined object of commemorating the marriage of the Prince of Wales and uniting the funds of the Freemasons' Orphan School, came off on Tuesday night in the Assembly Rooms, and was one of the most brilliant and successful which has ever been held in that city. The assembly numbered 130 persons, and the room was filled at the height of the dancing by all parts of the county.

Mr. Ambler's shorthorns were sold on Wednesday last by Mr. Verhezell. The twenty-five bulls averaged £61 5s., and the whole 48 £45 2s. 3d. The total proceeds of the sale were £1602 2s., and the average £33 7s. 6d. Lots sold:—Duke of Oxford, 1 (£50), Henry Bige (Cliffe), 1 (£50), Ringlet (Mr. Atkinson, 7 (£5), Lillies (Lord Fitzwilliam (£6 5s.), and Chief Earls (Mr. Bates), 2 (£5 5s.), Messrs. Bates, Beale, Bush, Cruickshanks, Davis, Stubbs, Brockbank, and Jefferson were also purchasers.

The celebration of Shakspeare's birthday at Stratford-on-Avon, on Thursday week, was attended by a large number of visitors, the morning festivities of the Shakspeare Club and the Grammar School, in the afternoon Mr. James Bennett read the "Merchant of Venice," in the Town-hall Rooms; and in the evening a performance at the Royal Shakspearean Club was held in the Townhall. Mr. E. F. Flower, Mayor of Stratford-on-Avon, presided.

A beautifully-designed tesselated pave-ment has been discovered in the old cemetery adjoining the Cathedral, Gloucester, during excavations for a drain to a villa residence being built there. It was twenty-two feet below the surface of the ground. Besides the tesselated pave-ment, many remains have been found under similar circumstances in the ruins of Dorchester Abbey. Further discoveries may also be expected by the county as some indication of the interest which of her Majesty's Ministers to the locality will be taken in the future preservation of antiquities, &c.

Rockingham House, Roscommon, the seat of Lord Lorton, was totally destroyed by fire on Wednesday week. The Hon. Mrs. King and family had left the house for the Easter recess. The house was one of the finest modern edifices in Ireland.—A great fire, resulting in the destruction of property to the amount of £10,000, occurred at York, on Tuesday evening. The warehouses of Messrs. Clarke and Co., wholesale druggists, was burned to the ground, and some adjoining premises, including a shop of Mr. Sell, were seriously damaged.—Brookfield House, Birstall, near Bp'ds, the home seat of Lord Hawke, was destroyed by fire on Tuesday week.

Mr. Stansfeld was on Tuesday re-elected for Halifax without opposition. The hon. gentleman, in acknowledging this renewal mark of confidence, explained the circumstances which led to his resignation of Joint Lord of the Admiralty. He said he was invited to enter into one of the great departments of State to succeed Mr. Goschen, who resigned it for the administration of that department, and he was further given to understand that the Government hoped that no opposition would be expected by the country at some indication of the sincere wish of her Majesty's Ministers to be locally represented in the Board of Admiralty. Resignation of office. He at first hesitated to accept the offer, but, after careful consideration and consultation with his political friends, he felt that he could not refuse, and by taking office he might ultimately hope to be of more service to his country than if he were to elect once more to be returned to private life, and enjoyed perfect freedom, content and determined to play the part of nothing more than a man of political action and affairs for the remainder of his life."

The ship Sarah Palmer, from Calcutta, with a cargo valued at £120,000, was wrecked on Wednesday morning off Tenat.

A CRUISE IN BASS'S STRAITS.—We started, six in number, on board the cutter Gem, on the morning of the 19th of January, and made the land of Hunter's Island after a passage of two days. Here we met a man, his wife, and family, who had been living upon the island, in a hut, the only human beings on the island altogether. On the island we found several dogs, a great many wild rabbits, and a few sheep. We also found a few horses; the cost, of course; a lot of poultry, &c.; while among the wild animals we found a few kangaroos, and a lot of wallabies. The wild black swan were seen in all directions on the island, about thirteen miles in length. About seven miles from Hunter's Island we passed Three Hummock Island, the three Hummock Island, on which there are several good springs of fresh water. Cattle could be landed here, and would do well if properly attended to this island. Part of it is very thickly covered with brush-wood and tea-tree, but there is considerable open country. Kangaroos, emus, and rabbits reside it in a few years a most advantageous stock and sheep station would be made of this island. Into the Gem's hold we had obtained a heavy waste, all sand. On this little desert the mutton-birds chiefly make up their breeding-place. They are found in the sand-hills generally as deep as four or seven feet. The extraordinary habit of a dark mutton-bird is to leave its nest at night, and return to it at daylight, a most curious habit of the bird. Under the sand-hills, on the rock (which is covered to even flying from the beach inland to their nests, where men employed in the business of catching them in the dark, and killing them with sticks, which stock them down with sticks. Once they get on the rough and they cannot get away, and are easily caught and destroyed in large numbers. The first few days one egg once a year, and generally about the 25th of November. Our crew went on shore in search of mutton-birds' eggs, and found a large number of mutton-birds' eggs, about the size of a domestic turkey's, and which are very good eating. The mutton-bird when taken is fat, and weighs from the

THE LATE FIELD MARSHAL LORD SEATON.

One by one the few Peninsular heroes who survived their great chief are departing from us. It is no wonder. Nearly fifty years have passed away since Wellington's last famous victory secured to Europe a long spell of exhaustion, misnamed peace. Another generation has since then been born, that wears grey hairs, and by whom the doughty deeds of the great Duke's captains are remembered but as the fireside stories to which they used to listen at their father's knees. When word came to the present busy world that an old soldier was no more, who, as Sir John Colborne, had done memorable things, search for his achievements had to be made in a time and among records that seemed almost fabulous. Not that Lord Seaton had been altogether idle since he sheathed his sword on the evening after Waterloo had been fought and won. England's possessions are so large and numerous that we are never without a small war on our hands, or troubles threatening a large one; and Lord Seaton was actively employed on public service until quite a recent date.

Born as far back as the year 1776, the son of a Hampshire county gentleman, John Colborne was connected (distantly and on his mother's side) with his future great chief the Duke of Wellington. Losing his father while he was quite a child, he was sent to Christ's Hospital; but his mother marrying the Rev. T. Burgus, Vicar of Burkway, Herts, and Rector of Treford, Sussex, a dignitary besides of Winchester, the lad was removed to the foundation of Winchester College, where he perfected his education. His mother died in 1791, and young Colborne, left an orphan, entered the Army. They were stirring times, and promotion was speedy. His commission of Ensign in the Army bears date July 10, 1794. In 1800 he was Captain, Lieutenant-Colonel in 1809, and Colonel in June of the year in which Waterloo was fought. Meanwhile he had seen much service. He served in North Holland through the campaign of 1799; he was in Egypt in 1801; with the British and Russian troops on the Neapolitan frontier in 1805; he went through the campaign of the following year in Sicily and Calabria; and in 1808-9 he acted as Military Secretary to Sir John Moore, with whom he fought at Corunna. He next joined Wellington, being always on active service; he commanded a brigade in Sir Rowland Hill's division in 1810 and 1811, fought at Busaco, Badajoz, and Albuera; and at Ciudad Rodrigo, where he was severely wounded, he performed one of the most gallant achievements of the war. For the following account of the episode of this famous siege, in which Colonel Colborne figured so conspicuously, we are indebted to the pen of an old Peninsular officer and brother-in-arms:—"A detachment from the Light Division was ordered to attack and carry the detached fort of San Francisco, under the command of Lieut.-Colonel Colborne of the 52nd Regiment. They leapt into the ditch of the fort, and in placing the ladders against the wall and attempting to mount them they broke, being made out of the rails of the Spanish cars. The men then stuck their bayonets into the sod wall, and by that means entered and carried the work, the enemy upon seeing them retiring into a small guard-house and surrendering."

THE LATE FIELD MARSHAL LORD SEATON.

Recovering from his wound, Col. Colborne distinguished himself at the battles of the Nivelle and the Nive, during the campaign of the Basque Pyrenees, and at Orthes and Toulouse; and at the crowning fight of Waterloo the Colonel of the 52nd Light Infantry was in his place, and took a prominent part in that famous victory. The column of the Imperial Guard was forcing its way up the slight ascent that formed the summit of the British position, when Colonel Colborne, seeing the necessity of checking them at once, of his own accord let slip his regiment at them. The Duke saw his movement, and confirmed it. The French themselves admit that it was to Colborne's impetuous attack upon the Imperial Guard that its decisive defeat might be attributed.

Soon after the peace Sir John Colborne (he had by this time received the Order of the Bath) accepted the governorship of Guernsey. Thence he was appointed to the command of the forces in Canada, a post which he held from 1830 to 1838. For his services in putting down the Canadian rebellion Sir John was raised to the peerage. Subsequently he was appointed Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, while he was afterwards made Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland. Honours were showered upon him freely: he attained the rare, if not unprecedented, distinction of being Grand Cross of the three British orders of knighthood. The veteran soldier was highly esteemed by his Sovereign, in whose household he held the office of "Gold Stick."

As a politician Lord Seaton did not make himself conspicuous. His political opinions were of a Conservative tendency, but they were never prominently displayed. Since terminating his command in Ireland, so recently as the year 1860, Lord Seaton lived quietly at his seat in Devonshire. Shortly before his death, however, he removed for the benefit of his health to Torquay.

THE WEEHAWKEN.

We give an Engraving of the Weehawken, one of the nine Federal iron-clad gun-boats engaged in the recent attack on Charleston. This vessel shows only about sixteen inches above water. Her tower revolves by means of a small engine, and its weight rests on the central shaft, the lower portion of which bears on the keelsons. During action all apertures are shut, ventilation being kept up by two fans, which draw in air from the top of the tower, and the boiler-furnace carries out all foul air. In case of the enemy boarding, the guns may be brought to bear on deck, and hand-grenades thrown from the top of the turret. In the engagement at Charleston the Weehawken acted as pioneer, having attached to her bow an Ericsson raft, intended to lift or explode submarine torpedoes. During the night following the bombardment she lost her raft, which was washed ashore on Morris Island, and taken possession of by the enemy.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1863.

THE great "artillery duel," as American writers are so fond of calling what used to be termed a cannonade, seems to have astounded the Federal organs into something like frankness and veracity. They admit, almost candidly, that the Confederates have fairly beaten the fleet of the North. We would meet them in a similar spirit, by saying that (apart from the fact that the terrible swagger with which the certain destruction of Charleston was announced has been most sadly rebuked) there is nothing to be ashamed of in the check that has been sustained. The South had done everything that science could suggest to make the harbour impregnable, and the advantages were chiefly on the Confederate side. The fire of the defenders was swift, and yet but one vessel was sunk, and the others placed hors de combat, and the Northern commander effected a safe retreat with the others. A "safe retreat" is, to judge by the history of the war, the height of the ambition of Federal land captains; and the Federal sea captains, who have occasionally done much more, are not to be classified for simply keeping up to the standard of Union successes. It behoves us at home to study this conflict with reference to more important considerations than the reputation of American leaders; but into this part of the business we do not propose to enter at present.

Charleston is invicta. It is said that Washington, in North Carolina, has been relieved; but we are uncertain on this point. Vicksburg is described as being prepared for the fiercest attack, and victualled for the longest siege likely to be laid. There are the usual rumours of mysterious movements, and of great things that are to be suddenly done; but we might keep this article open in stereotype, as also its usual lame anti-climax, which arrives with the next batch of telegrams. The war may be said, briefly, to be in the most unsatisfactory state as regards the North; and yet the paper of largest circulation distinctly asserts that a crisis is approaching in which it will be necessary to hand over the Union to a military dictator and despot—the words are the journal's own. It comforts the people by precedents to show that the natural progress of all States is from liberty to despotism; so that, we presume, England, who thinks herself not to be entirely without some little remnant of freedom, is considered to be in a transition condition. We can wait.

Meantime, and while looking out for a dictator, and while the army takes every opportunity of cheering "little Mac," the new made Presbyterian, in proof that the soldiers comprehend the real meaning of the elaborate pamphlet published against him by the Republican commissioners, the American GOVERNMENT, we are told, has made up its mind to inform Earl Russell that if another vessel of English build gets into the hands of the Confederates, Lord Lyons and Mr. Adams shall change places. Of course, if this be true, the probabilities are in favour of a collision. We think we may assume it as certain that no one, save the workers of the American press in London, will ask Lord Russell to propose to Parliament to change the law—the Foreign Enlistment law. Even to please Mr. Seward, we are not prepared to accelerate the progress which we have been making along the road to a despotism. We must continue to adhere to the old Saxon rule which, in the most unenlightened manner, prescribes that there shall be some evidence of guilt before anybody is punished. The law has been, of course, evaded. Not one vessel in ten that escapes escaped us, as hundreds have escaped from the vigilance of the American authorities themselves, though they had ten times the means of preventing such escapes, and were bound by no superstitious regard for the arrangements called laws. But where evidence could be obtained we have interfered, and the Alexandra lies in helpless captivity. Mr. Seward knows all this perfectly well, and we doubt not that at his own table he speaks with all recognition of the bona fides of the English Government, though the necessities of party, for which we make all allowance, induce him to permit agitation against this country, and may have even driven him to the extreme step of requiring us to commit illegal acts in order to satisfy the North. We speak of Mr. Seward, for it is clear that the Government is virtually passed from the hands of the good-natured attorney, who ought to have been left to entertain his friends with highly-flavoured anecdotes in Kentucky. Mr. Seward must understand that there is nothing England would so much hate as a war with America, except a war with France; and he must know that we have the power of rights to the protection of the law, until it can be shown that there is a prima facie case for converting the protector into a punisher.

We are not, however, in the absence of more specific information, inclined to believe that Mr. Seward has done more than reiterate the complaints which have been so conclusively answered by Earl Russell, even if the American statesman has done so much. The kind of despatch which has been described would have next to nothing to be done beyond a recall of Lord Lyons, and then the final preparation for that for which Mr. Roebuck, in language that cannot be condemned more strongly than it deserves, needlessly stated we were ready, calling on himself the indignant reproof of the generous-hearted Monckton Milnes. For such an issue we believe that no statesman in America is really prepared; and the statesmen and educated classes would, we imagine, signify in an unmistakable way, at need, that the destinies of their country had been played with long enough. The instant recognition of the South would follow, the blockade of the Northern ports would be removed with commerce, and if France did not rush into the quarrel it would only be because her mediation would be sought by those who have so rudely repulsed it, in confidence in the will and power of England to keep her ally in good temper. We would not for the world say that we think it possible that opinion about which so much nonsense has been talked, but which American soldiers are now declaring to be as formidable as anything in the South; for to the invasion of Canada we do not believe the war would ever come. But for any part of this precipitate movement it is unprepared. Nevertheless, Lord Mr. Seward will hardly have risked new damage to the amour propre of his subjects by sending a despatch which can receive no notice beyond acknowledgment. We should hear, with a gladness for which the American press will give us no credit, but which the better nature of those who sent the Grinwold to Liverpool will surely understand, that the Charleston lesson, in which there is no disgrace, has been accepted by the North as a final intimation that the crimson flag with the blue cross is not to be insulted with impunity by Government or people. We will write these lines on the anniversary of the proclamation of European peace seven years ago, and wish we could find an omen in the date.

THE DISTRESS IN LANCASHIRE

THE monthly report of the hon. Secretary of the Central Relief Committee at Manchester shows that the number of persons relieved in the week ending 18th inst. was 19,000, being a decrease of 1,000 as compared with the previous week. While Mr. Fazenall's weekly return shows a further decrease of 4004 in the number of persons receiving relief in the Ashton district, the report adds that "the total receipts of the week had been £3819 14s. 3d., and the balance at the Lancashire and Yorkshire Bank had consequently increased to £5000." A meeting on Monday was one of £700 from Honolulu—the name of the King of the Sandwich Islands appears on the list of donors. Mr. Hawthorn stated that sixteen packages of clothing, ninety-six barrels of flour, six boxes of bacon, and six barrels of rice had been sent off to Ireland by the last consignment. Various grants having been made, the proceedings terminated.

The Lancaster Committee for the relief of the distress in Lancashire held a meeting yesterday week. Their recent resolution to devote £5000 to the encouragement of emigration had given rise to a number of applications from various parts of the country; but the committee declined to afford help in any instance where a society existed which was fully formed and organized and ready to start. They voted funds for relief to several local committees.

At the annual meeting of the Manchester Ragged School Union Committee, held at the Townhall on Tuesday, the executive committee reported that since the last meeting 1,000 children had been gathered into the schools, and had received clothing to the number of 1,500.

Yesterday week there arrived in the Mersey two ships laden with cotton from Calcutta, and two vessels were also reported at a later hour as having been seen with "Celestial" cotton for Liverpool. The names of the two vessels are the Agra and Shannon. They left Bengal on Dec. 30 and Calcutta on Jan. 8. The arrivals of cotton from China at Liverpool continue, and Tuesday last the Sapphire, William Fairfield, Captain Wilson, was reported in the Mersey from China. These vessels are laden with about 8370 bales.

Letters from Algeria state that the cultivation of cotton was receiving increased attention, not only in Bonnes Ayres, but in Constantz, Batagrayr, &c.; and that everything was being done to promote the cotton crop this month. The Sultan, in a speech made by him on Thursday week to the principal officers of his household, said that he "was not grateful to Heaven for the cotton committee, and intended to further by every means the extension of that culture."

A letter from Philippeville, in Algeria, states that the high price of cotton in the French markets has induced a great number of colonists in Algeria to undertake its cultivation. Among many successful attempts, M. Portelli, of Philippeville, obtained 30,000 lb. of raw cotton (short staple) from twelve acres of ground.

Fourteen vessels, with cotton from Calcutta for Liverpool, arrived at Newry between March 16 and April 10.

The Barbadoes Legislature was opened by the Governor on March 26. Mr. C. Packer was elected Speaker of the House of Assembly.

THE COURT.

The Queen remains at Windsor Castle. Her Majesty, accompanied by Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse and Princess Helena, drove out on Saturday, attended by Major-General Rood, Equerry in Waiting. This was the anniversary of the birthday of Princess Louis of Hesse.

On Sunday Princess Louis entered with the churching of women in the morning, where the service appointed for the churching of a woman was performed by the Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor. Her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Louis of Hesse were present.

Monday the christening of the infant daughter of Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse took place in the presence of her Majesty. In the evening Prince Alfred and their Grand Duke Highnesses the Princes of Hesse dined at the castle.

On Tuesday the Queen held a Privy Council, which was attended by Earl Granville, Lord Lyveden, Lord Clarendon, Lord Russell, and the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. Earl De Grey was, by command of her Majesty, a festival performance was given in honour of the Royal visitors. The Prince and Princess of Wales, who were accompanied by Princess Helena and Prince Alfred, and attended by a numerous and brilliant suite, arrived immediately after eight o'clock. Their Royal Highnesses were received by Earl De Grey, the lessee, and conducted to the State box. The Royal party was attired in white satin and lace, and wore the magnificent tiaras of diamonds given by the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Louis of Hesse on the occasion of their Majesties' visit to Denmark. Knots and loops of diamonds decorated the several points of the dress, and gave brilliancy to the beauty by which the fair Princess is so conspicuously distinguished. The Lords and Ladies in Waiting and Princess Mary were present, attended by Lady Geraldine Somerset and Colonel Henry Somerset.

On Wednesday the Prince and Princess received addresses of congratulation from numerous corporations and other bodies. The addresses were read by the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe, Lord in Waiting. The Princess was attended by Lord Harris, Countess De Grey, and the Hon. Mrs. Grey.

On Thursday their Royal Highnesses honoured the Royal Academy with a visit previous to the opening. The illustrious party were met by the president and other academicians, who conducted them through the various rooms.

PRINCE AND PRINCESS LOUIS OF HESSE.

The christening of the infant Princess, daughter of their Royal Highnesses Prince Louis of Hesse and Princess Louis of Hesse (Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland), took place on Monday, at one o'clock, in the Green Drawing-room at Windsor Castle, according to the rites of the Church of England.

The baptism was performed in German by the Rev. Mr. Bentz, Court Chaplain to the Grand Ducal family of Hesse, who travelled from Darmstadt expressly to officiate upon this occasion.

The sponsors present were her Majesty the Queen, his Grand Ducal Highness Prince Alexander of Hesse (representative of the Prince of Hesse), her Royal Highness Princess Mary of Cambridge, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and his Grand Ducal Highness Prince Henry of Hesse. The infant was named by the Queen, who held the child at the font, Victoria Alberta Elizabeth Matilda Mary.

The following Royal and illustrious party were also present at the ceremony:—Their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, Prince Frederick William Nicholas Charles, the Duke of Newcastle, the Duke of Cambridge, and his Serene Highness the Prince of Leiningen.

The font of silver-gilt used upon this occasion was originally made for the christening of the Princess Royal, and was filled with water brought from the Jordan by the Prince of Wales.

The chief officers of State and the ladies and gentlemen of the household also assembled in the apartments of the Queen and Prince in the Windsor uniform, and members of orders of knighthood present wore their respective insignia.

The ceremony was concluded at a quarter before two o'clock. The Royal family were then conducted to the White Room, where a register of the baptism was signed by the several sponsors in the Council-room. A dejeuner was served. The christening-cake was ornamented with the arms of Hesse, and also with bouquets of flowers and rows of pearls.

THE ALBERT MEMORIAL.

In a communication to Sir C. Eastlake, General Grey says he has received the commands of the Queen to acknowledge the receipt of the report of the committee appointed to give her Majesty their assistance in the consideration of questions relative to the national memorial to the Prince Consort. "Her Majesty has directed that her best thanks may be given to the committee for the valuable services which they have rendered and the advice which they have submitted to her Majesty. The Queen very fully participates in the regret expressed by the committee that it has been found necessary to abandon for the present the idea of the central hall, which, combined with a permanent building, would have appropriately been the habitat of national gratitude with the objects in which the great and good Prince Albert, to whose memory it was intended also to have been associated with the memorial the recollections of the Exhibition of 1851. This regret is, however, modified by the expectation that whenever the commissioners of 1851 may be prepared to appropriate the ground in open north of the conservatory in the Royal Horticultural Gardens to the purposes for which the estate was acquired, they may still form part of the buildings to be erected there. The personal memorial to the Prince was always to be a statue, and the Queen never contemplated the combination of the central hall until that was adequately provided for. Under these circumstances, the Queen is happy to see that the committee concur entirely with the views of the design of Mr. Scott, to which her Majesty had already given the preference, among the many unsatisfactory designs submitted for her judgment."

His Grand Duke Highness Prince Alexander of Hesse and his Grand Duke Highness Prince Henry of Hesse have arrived at Marlborough House.

Earl Russell left town on Wednesday evening for Windsor Castle, on a visit to her Majesty.

The Countess de Grey and family have arrived at their residence in Wilton-place from the Continent, for the season.

Countess Francis Waldegrave and Mr. Chichester Fortescue, M.P., have returned from Ireland to Navestock-garden for the season.

A marriage is arranged to take place between Miss Lowther, daughter of Colonel the Hon. Augustus Lowther, C.B., Groom of the Stole, and Mr. son of the Earl of Galmsborough.

The marriage of Colonel E. Taylor, C.B., with Lady Jane Hay, daughter of the Marquis of Tweeddale, will take place in June.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Milbank and Miss Milbank have arrived in Grosvenor-street, from Yorkshire.

A deaf and dumb gentleman, named De Chastellux, has just been admitted Bachelor of Sciences in Paris. The examination was carried on in writing.

Advices from Warsaw state that the police have consented to allow persons to walk in the streets until nine at night without a lantern, and until eleven with one.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

One of the most phenomenal features of the day is the anxiety displayed by influential Londoners to keep London ugly and unsweetable. You have only to propose a metropolitan improvement to be looked up as a destructive and an incendiary, only one degree removed from the wretch who would tamper with our glorious Constitution, pension off the Portland vase, or burn down hayricks. Twice have the Legislature thrown out a bill for demolishing Wych-street and Holywell-street. The Lords' Committee have made short work of the Fitzbury and Regent-circus railways. The Marquis of Salisbury, the patron of Hatfield, the vestry of St. Marylebone, and the Metropolitan Board of Works are all up in arms against the conversion of Leicester-square into a fruit and flower market; and although the Committee of the Commons decided that the Marquis and the St. James's parishes had no locus standi in the question, the vestry of St. Martin's and the Board of Works have had their say. Mr. Tarver's in-arched structure is certainly gorgeous in its proportions, and a somewhat Utopian Crystal Palace, built of iron and glass, and surmounted by cupolas, having a southern façade of 300ft., and another of 970ft., intersected by eight cross-avenues, and divided into appropriate compartments for the sale of fruit, flowers, and other commodities! Such a scheme looks excellently well on Triplet-board, or in indian ink and water colour. The inhabitants of Leicester-square and the neighbourhood do not, however, think of Mr. Tarver's plans and he has failed to erect such a building in the midst of the town, and probably will not succeed in doing so much invasible light and air.

There is much to be said on both sides; but, assuming the market and improvements to be absolutely necessary, and the thoroughfare, or scheme to have definitively fallen through, will the Board, or, as the vestry, or the Government make anything of Leicester-square, or elevate it from its present condition, which is simply that of a disgraceful nuisance to the metropolis? Since we commenced this a few weeks back we have attempts, with a few wheelbarrows full of turf and gravel, have been made to put it on a respectable footing, and flower-beds; and the battered, crippled statue of George II., anticipately buried beneath Mr. Wyld's Great Globe, has been shorn of its propped up with timbers. The evil still attaches to the rails, dismantlement, and desolation. Give us a real garden, or a real statue, or a real terrace in the middle of the square, or else sweep away the whole nation to convert it into a market; but its existing state is clearly intolerable. After all, "Leicester-square" was not built as a haunt for the modelest of foreigners. Some of the most illustrious of English worthies have dwelt there. Where now is an hotel lived William Penn. Where now is an eating-house lived Sir Joshua Reynolds; where now is a pastrycook's lived Sir Isaac Newton; where now is a tobacconist's lived Hogarth; where now is a fruiterer's lived Jesse Rayford; where now is a fruiterer's lived Jesse Rayford; where now is a fruiterer's lived Jesse Rayford

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THIS is not so humdrum a Session after all. The old features are coming out, and the only new habit that prevails as yet is that late sittings are the exception, and there is a term of remonstrance about the Lower House against lapsing into that pernicious custom. It is curious to observe how little influence the Government possesses in the regulation and management of the Commons—witness the other night, when the first of the two debates on our relations with America—both have occurred in the last five or six days was forced on against the manifest reluctance of Ministers. Mr. Bentinck had given notice of a motion, which would, he thought, bring the subject on; but it seemed that attempts had been made to stave it off, and it is possible that the formal motion might have been withdrawn. Mr. Roebuck, in an unbridgeable rage, dashed into an extempore assault on his opponent-brothers across the Atlantic, and proceeded, in reason as his quondam brothers across the Atlantic, and proceeded, in reason as his quondam brothers across the Atlantic, and proceeded, in reason as his quondam

A MORNING REHEARSAL AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

We this week present our readers with a representation of the stage of Her Majesty's Theatre during a morning rehearsal. It would be difficult for the greatest habitué to recognise in its undress the scene of so much attraction and so many triumphs. The theatre now is in its working costume; the stage is stripped of all its glitter and colour; what light there is comes, with the exception of a few gas jets to illuminate the orchestra, from windows high above the gallery; strange, incongruous pieces of scenery lumber the stage; the boxes are draped with canvas covers, the stalls are empty, for, as usual, there is a two hours' interval between one and behind the footlights. The orchestra is assembled in full force, and the stage is crowded with the major operatic stars, the leader of departments, and the chorus.

Our Artist has caught very happily the aspect of this busy professional scene. The seated figure on the right of the Engraving, viewing the scene with very natural interest, is that of Mr. Mapleson, the enterprising and spirited lessee of the theatre, who, perhaps more, unwearied with theatrical business, can form anything like a correct idea of the qualities the combination of which is necessary to constitute a good stage manager. In addition to the possession of a rich taste and knowledge of music as shall enable him to select the best artists to be engaged for the full development of his lessee against a musical public so critical as that of London, he must possess administrative faculties of a very high yet elastic order, capable to keep the heterogeneous mass under his command in due cohesion, and equal to any emergency; from such a one as may arise from the sudden illness of a prima donna or the unpreparedness of a new opera which are constantly occurring in the minute and troublesome details of management.

The central figure in our Engraving are those of (beginning at the 4th) Signor Gassier, Mdlle. Titiens, and Signor Gardoni. The stage-master is seen giving very earnest exhortations to his troupe, and in the conductor of the orchestra Signor Arditi will at once be recognised. The gentleman in rehearsal is that of "Il Talismano," and as it progresses it becomes somewhat humorous to observe with what nonchalance the famous tenor Giuglini sings the impassioned music of Arturo, and how composedly the great German prima donna rehearses the musical trials and woes of Elvira.

It may be remarked, en passant, that very active business is going on elsewhere than on the boards of the house. Above, among the skyrights of the roofs, windlasses, ropes, and pulleys, look like the cordage of some irregularly-rigged ship; below, in the mast of machinery which underlies the stage, workmen are busy repairing the attic of the house, workers are busy preparing the effects of the coming night. Indeed, the visit of Her Majesty's Theatre has been very busy and, to the units that compose it and the public for whose amusement they labour, a very important world.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Since the "blue and black belt" of Lord Stamford first appeared on the turf, it has never been in such force as on the One Thousand day, when Lady Louisa and Flying Dutchman ran the first mile and a half a mile from home, and has a pleasant gallop home by themselves. It is said that his winnings were £20,000. All the best horses were not there, but, as ill-luck will have it, Lady Augusta is not in the St. Leger or the Derby. Tomado, the favourite, had made but little use of her winter. So far, Lady Augusta and Molly Carew have taken complete possession of the three and two of '63. As in 1861, when Diophantus and Nemus were in the ascendant, the Newmarket stable has carried off the great April race. Lady Augusta was bred by Lord Derby, and purchased by Lord Stamford, at Doncaster yearling sale, for 1,000 gs. less than Sir Joseph Hawley gave for her own brother at the same place last September, when four of the Knowsley yearlings realised 3,850 gs. A handsomer and more level filly big has seldom been seen on the turf. Obtaful, for whose own Knowsley-bred brother, Regent, Lord St. Vincent's agent, Mr. Day, has also did good service to Lord Stamford last week. Hospodar's friends account in a great measure for his defeat—overpowered, "cast," twisted fore-legs," "dry as a biscuit," "sore shins," &c.; and Rechercherie a Derby corps take comfort from the belief that he was "big." Mr. Ferguson's yearlings opened the ball with Oaks and, very poorly, at Newmarket, as sixteen, headed by a Vedette colt from Catsby's dam, only realised 1,000 gs. Mr. Day's yearlings, variously for sale in June number twenty-nine—sixteen fillies and thirteen colts—ran, in Orlando, four by Voltigeur, two by Newminster, two by Weird, one by Elliington, two by Windhound, three by Wild Dayrell, three by Newminster, one by The Cure, two by Stockwell, and one by Satrapin. The 14th colt and 2nd sold (Adventurer's colt, 1,000 gs. 50 to 1 the day before) in the Great Northern Handicap at York, for which Carbonero cut up badly; and the Yorkshiremen have always been great supporters of Leamington, had the pleasure of seeing his daughter, Tarlatan, win the Retford Handicap next day.

Fordham has been able to ride again after his shaking, and Aldcroft, who was thrown from the Pyalin colt on his way to the post for the Two-Year-Old Plate, is going on favourably after the bereavement of Alfred Day, one of the neatest and finest riders of the day, who died a month after about the same time last year. Mr. Payne's His finishes on The Flea at Newmarket, and on Vivandière, against Frank Butler, at York, and his nursing of Dervenagh and Ely, are among his finest performances; but wasting even to 8 st. 10 lb. was too hard a trial for his constitution, and his illness after riding Ackworth in the same season that he won Stamford and Grimston for Day has secured Sam Rogers's services in the nick of time, and he is not likely to be unclothed in that stable's pea-and-blue jacket. The Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has signified his intention of bringing his division of the races at "the meeting" to a close in July, and it is proposed to hold a two-days' meeting when the Prince is at Sandringham. The Jockey Club have grappled decisively at last with the starting question, and, having set their faces hard to prevent those eternal trespasses upon the patience of the public and the starters, they are about to proceed against "Anon" for duly presenting himself on the booth in defiance of their October notice. As long as false starts, which was warranted to be the case by Mr. Greville, General Peel, and others of the most experienced and eldest members of the Jockey Club remains unrescinded, they are bound to refuse their discretion over the head, and it will be very difficult to suppose that they can fail. As regards the other "little press difficulty," the article in question has not yet been seen or heard or noticed, were equally "out of order."

William Scott, who was Huntsman to the Brocklehy hounds for several seasons, has again received the horn. Since his retirement he had been farming under Lord Yarborough.

The Ascot Spring Meeting season is over, and the Chester meeting, whose cup betting has been quite ruined by the oversight in handicapping Gladiateur, occupies from Tuesday till Friday next. The Stakes does not seem likely to throw any further light on the Epsom event. Fourteen of Sir Joseph's yearlings, four of them by Stockwell, seven by Knight of Kars, will be sold on Thursday, and the voyagers can step on the return journey, and slip up from Rugby to Euston on Saturday for the Lord Stamford's eighty-hundred sovereign by Windhound. The "All England Eleven" open their season by playing 22 of Rugby and district on Monday, and to-morrow (Saturday), the Royal London Yacht Club have their opening trip from Blackwall.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

This large increase in the supply of money in the general discount market, the heavy importation of the precious metals, the favourable state of the foreign exchanges, and the limited demand for bullion on foreign account, have produced more firmness in the demand for home stocks. Prices have steadily advanced, but the business doing has been by no means extensive. The unfavourable weather in the agricultural districts continues to retard the unsettled state. Although it is stated that rather large purchases of Rupee Paper and Debentures generally have been effected on investment account in India, where the quotations rule very high, Indian Stocks, &c., have shown less firmness than in recent weeks.

The demand for accommodation has been by no means active, and, in some instances, the terms for the commercial paper have been lowered by the holders of bills. In Lombard-street the quotations are as follow:—

Three days' bills ... 3½ per cent. | Four months' bills ... 3½ per cent.
Short dates' bills ... 3½ | Six months' bills ... 3½ or 4
Three months' bills ... 3½

Money is unusually abundant in the Stock Exchange, and it may be had for short periods at 2½ per cent.

On Thursday the Directors of the Bank of England reduced their minimum rate of discount to 3 per cent.

On the Continent capital is in moderate request, as under:—

	Bank rate.	Open market.		Bank rate.	Open market.
	per cent.	per cent.		per cent.	per cent.
Paris ...	3	2½	Amsterdam ...	3½	3
Vienna ...	6	5	Hamburg ...	3½	3½
Berlin ...	4	3½	Brussels ...	3	2½
Frankfort ...	4	3½	Madrid ...	5	4½
Petersburg ...	5	4½	Copenhagen ...	4½	4½

Upwards of £600,000 in bullion has arrived from various quarters, and nearly £400,000 has been withdrawn for account of the Bank of England. The steamer for Bombay took out £130,000.

The latest advices from New York bring the premium on gold 51¾.

The annexed return shows the state of the note circulation in the United Kingdom during the four weeks ending April 4:—

	Feb. 28.	March 7.	March 14.	March 21.	March 28.	April 4.
Bank of England	£21,452,930	£21,452,930	£21,452,930	£21,452,930	£21,452,930	£21,452,930
Private Banks	3,357,135	3,357,135	3,357,135	3,357,135	3,357,135	3,357,135
Joint-Stock Banks	5,339,771	5,339,771	5,339,771	5,339,771	5,339,771	5,339,771
Ireland	6,390,771	6,390,771	6,390,771	6,390,771	6,390,771	6,390,771
Total	£36,540,607	£36,540,607	£36,540,607	£36,540,607	£36,540,607	£36,540,607

Compared with the same period last year, the above return shows a decrease of £303,146 in the circulation of the United Kingdom. The amount in specie held by the Bank of England is £16,952,930.

No material change took place in the value of Home Stocks on Monday. Consols left off at 92¼ for the Account. Reduced left off at 92¼ and New Three per Cents, 91¼; Exchequer Bills, 6s. to 8s. prem.; India Bonds, 4s. to 6s. prem.; Long Annuities, 1874, 14¼; Bank Stock, 214 to 216; Three-and-a-Half per Cent Rupee Paper, 101¾. The quotations were rather on the rise on Tuesday, and Consols left off at 92¼ for money and 92¼ for the Account; 91¾ India Five per Cents, 102¾; Bank Stock, 214 to 216; India Bonds, 10s. to 12s. prem.; Exchequer Bills, 6s. to 8s. prem.; and India Three-and-a-Half per Cents, 101¾. Consols left off at 92¼ for money and 92¼ for the Account; 91¾ Exchequer Bills sold at 5s. to 8s. prem.; and India Five per Cents, 102¾. Bank Stock left off at 214 to 216; India Bonds, 10s. to 12s. prem.; and India Three-and-a-Half per Cents, 101¾.

The transactions in American Securities have been very limited: nevertheless, the Illinois Central Shares have been done at 84 ex div.; and Erie Preferred Shares have marked 47½; Ditto, Seven per Cent Preference, 86½; Illinois Central, 1863, 94½.

During to the repulse of the Federals at Charleston, Confederate scrip has been much inquired for, and quotations have risen to 1½ per cent premium. Mexican Stock, Turkish Consolidés, and Spanish Passive Stock have realised a somewhat favourable improvement in value; but new Foreign Securities are flat. Brazilian Five per Cents have marked 105¾; Brazilian Four-and-Half per Cents, 94¼; Buenos Ayres, 84 ex div.; Ditto, Deferred, 83; Reguiras, 98; Ditto, Second Issue, 97½; Greek, 29½; Ditto, Coupons, 5 to 6 prem.; Ditto, New, 29½; Honduras, 15½; Mexican, 35½; Peruvian Consolidated Stock, 71½; Ditto, Deferred, 44; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 67½; Portuguese, 1853, 44½; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1853, 44½; Ditto, Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1856, 39¾; Ditto Five per Cents, 1862, 39½; Sardinian Five per Cents, 1861, 79½; Spanish Three per Cents, 39½; Ditto, Passive, 5¼; Ditto, Certificates, 11; Turkish Old Six per Cents, 1858, 1862, 1854, 1855, 1858, 1860, 1861, Consolidated Coupons, 23¼; Ditto Six per Cents, 1862; Ditto Six per Cents, 1863; Ditto Six per Cents, 1863; Ditto Six per Cents, 1863

CRAMER'S ENGLISH PIANETTE, 22 Guineas. Cramer and Co. manufacture this original small instrument, which has all the power and quality of tone of a cottage pianoforte, but is much less. The case is of polished oak or rosewood. The Pianette the fingers of the player will be strengthened much more rapidly than on an old instrument,known in the key and worn in the hammer. In rosewood, 35 guineas; with fret, 38 guineas.
Cramer, Beale, and Wood's pianofortes are of that instrument but the common or single action, but the double or check action; and that Cramer and Co. are the only manufacturers of it in England.

CRAMER'S DRAWING-ROOM COTTAGE. Cramer and Co. have introduced this Cottage Pianoforte of the medium size, and of the very best description. The tone is rich, full, and sympathetic, and the touch elastic and firm. The Check Action, that instrument has been produced in this country. The quality of wood, and general refinement which have gained for it universal approbation, are to be found in this Cottage now possibly be made. In rosewood, 36 guineas; walnut, 42 guineas.
207 and 209, REGENT-STREET.

BOOSEY'S MINIATURE PIANOFORTE, price 17 guineas, in walnut or mahogany.—We have had occasion to notice the very excellent Miniature Pianofortes by Boosey and Sons, which combine quality of tone with portability in a very remarkable degree. The last model is certainly the most elegant. When heard in connection with the voice of a full-grown man. In blending most elegant' meats with the voice of a full-grown man. In his opinion the instrument is unrivalled. The tone is full and rich, and the touch is even and the whole mechanism is excellent. In addition to the above, we have received a letter, but even before from professional men, as Mr. Charles Halle, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, Mr. Benedict, Mr. Walter Macfarren, Mr. Cipriani Potter, Mr. Sydney Smith, Mr. Thalberg, Mr. Brinley Richards, Mr. Kuhe, Mr. Lindsay Sloper, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Oliver King, Mr. Pauer, Mr. Hallé, Mr. Hallé, Mr. Hallé

GAINSBOROUGH'S PORTRAIT OF MRS. SIDDONS.

THE most precious acquisition made to the examples of our British painters in the National Gallery, South Kensington, since the Vernon bequest is, we think, the portrait of Mrs. Siddons, by Gainsborough, which we have engraved. This exquisite work is as great a shock-de'œuvre of Gainsborough as Lord Hertford's famous "Lady O'Brien" (which we also engraved some eight years since) is of that other great English master, Sir Joshua Reynolds. This present portrait was painted in the year 1784, when Mrs. Siddons was in her twenty-sixth year, "in the prime of her beauty and at the height in the full blaze of her popularity." The year before Sir Joshua Reynolds had painted her as "The Tragic Muse," now in the Grosvenor Gallery, and as a subscription proof of which is in the Dulwich Gallery. It is related in Fulcher's "Life" that Gainsborough found some difficulty in persuading the tragic queen of the actress—the nose especially; and that, after repeatedly altering its shape, he exclaimed, "Confound the thing, I can't end to it"; meaning, we must infer, for the credit of Gainsborough's gallantry, to the length of labour painting it involved. There is, however, not the slightest evidence of effort or uncertainty in the delicate and sculpturesque modelling of the nose, or in any other portion of the picture. On the contrary, although the head is highly finished, the whole is painted with that marvellously serial touch, and, as it were, absolute spontaneity, in which Gainsborough has never been surpassed—not, it is our firm conviction, even by Vercosse, Rubens, or Velasquez. Mrs. Fanny Kemble pays a tribute to this portrait which indicates just perception of its merits. "A more exquisitely graceful, refined, and harmonious picture," says she, "I have never seen. The delicacy and sweetness, combined with the power and richness of the colouring, make it a very peculiar picture." Mrs. Jameson observes of it: "The grave Muse of the tragic drama, Siddons remember seeing her when seated near this picture, and looking from one to the other, it was like her still in the age of seventy." Mrs. Siddons possessed this picture as long as she lived. Even more interesting, and more gratifying to the reader than any remarks we could offer will be a critique by M. Blanc, one of the most eminent art-critics of France, upon this portrait, "the chief this to immortality," as he considers it of "the best painting of the whole Anglaise," written when it was in the gallery of the Art-Treasures Exhibition, Manchester. "The profile," says this enthusiastic but sound critic, "drawn with firmness, modelled with a something sublime, something fatefully impassioned. The great tragedienne, who was endowed the passions with a power of expression equal to that who experienced them so deeply on her own account, is better rendered in this simple half-length portrait than in her celebrated drama, than in those allegorical portraits as "The Tragic Muse," or disguised in the characters she assumed as actress. This portrait is so original, so much as an actress, so much a tragic character, as an instance of how much may be gained by uniting grace of mien to elegant disposition of accessories, to the richness or boldness of colouring and freedom of handling, that it resembles the paintings of no other master. Gainsborough stands alone in this as in analogous work, but none would be found. Perhaps something of Vercosse? But no; it is a creation quite unique, and therein is the proof of its genius. On studying all its component parts, similarity the portrait should certainly be placed among Gainsborough's works, even before the famous 'Blue Boy.'" The "Blue Boy," however, we must add that this "Mrs. Siddons" and Reynolds's "Mrs O'Brien" should be in the Louvre, in order to complete the impression which still prevails on the Continent respecting the fact that there has ever existed any great English painters. The wish cannot, however, now be gratified, in respect at least to this picture. It was purchased last year (very cheaply) for £1000, for our National Gallery, from Major Muir, who was enabled to make the purchase by the bequest of the actress's son. We need only add a word or two on Lawrence's portraits and the colouring of the picture. The contrast of the simpler version of the great actress will bear comparison with one of Sir Joshua's noblest inspirations, it completely eclipses the representations of Sir Thomas Lawrence. The expression of the great actress degenerates in the hands of the latter into something which, by this artist's commonplace, is something between unexaggerated as to size. The lips are deliciously pulpy, and of a lovely, healthy crimson. The eye of the lady, spectacled and with the fashion of the time, and of the grace manin neckerchief blend magically with the "carnations." Then come the blue scarf and trimmings, and the white and blue striped silk dress directly opposite the centre of the background, and contrasted—though broken by reflexes with monpaddle art—with the buff of the same dress on the left arm of the chair, and brown muff. The hand lying with such natural abandonment is, like the rest of this superb picture, painted as even Gainsborough seldom paints.

MARLBOROUGH HOUSE.

MARLBOROUGH HOUSE, the town residence of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, stands at the west end of Pall-mall, next to St. James's Palace. The garden-front, which we engrave, is cheerful, whilst that towards Pall-mall assumes a grand and stately aspect, grounded from public view by a wall. The mansion was built from Wren's designs, in 1710, for the first Duke of Marlborough. Here the Duchess lived in a degree of state which threw "her neighbour, George," as she termed the King, entirely in the background with his adjoining palace. Both the Duke and the Duchess ended their days here. Marlborough House became State property in 1817, when it was purchased for Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold. Prince Leopold. It was also the residence of Queen Adelaide after the death of King William IV. In 1850 the mansion was assigned to the use of the Prince of Wales. The Vernon Collection of pictures and other works of art were for some years exhibited in the state apartments, which the upper rooms being temporarily used by the Department of Practical Art.

The Morning Post gives the following account of the alterations and reconstructions which have been made in order to adapt Marlborough House for a town residence for the Prince and Princess:—

A new entrance-hall has been added to the north front of the house, and additional space has been obtained in the interior. This hall is built out into the courtyard, and there are wooden screens on each side of the entrance-hall; these on the right lead to the comptroller's rooms and private way to the Prince's library; the left side of the screen opens into the new entrance-hall. The old entrance-hall has been converted into a noble saloon about 40 ft. in length by 20 ft. in width. It is lighted from the roof, and has a fine passing across the south side. The ceiling and upper part of the walls, as well as the doors, are large oil paintings executed by the great Victorian of Marlborough. The walls have been covered with a rich paper of a delicate shade of white-buff and colour, and were bordered and contrasted round. They have been restored, and in some cases filled in, from the original engravings of the battles of Ramillies and Blenheim, in which Marlborough, as Commander-in-Chief, was the very prominent figure. On the lower part of the hall is placed tapestry, apparently of the date of Queen Anne's reign, representing some of the adventures of Sancho Panza and Don Quixote. In the centre of the principal side there is a large fireplace, which is of the same design as the same, if we are not mistaken, that was shown in the Exhibition of 1851, the subject being the "Rape of the Sabines" in marble. The saloon is lighted by windows draped with blue velvet curtains with handsome border borders. At night it is lighted by a large chandelier, and with borders tastefully ornamented with gems of glass. The floor is covered with a rich Axminster carpet, with white and coloured centre, and blue, and bearing the scrip and scrines are covered with tapestry of the date of Lord Godolphin; and the furniture is gilt and upholstered in blue velvet, and of a very handsome and ornamental character. The library is on the west side of the saloon. The windows of this room look out upon the garden towards St. James's Palace. The bookcases are of polished oak, ornamented with gold, and massive ornate panels; the ceiling is but slightly decorated; the walls have green and gold paper; and the windows satin curtains of the same colours. The chandeliers are ormolu, with tasteful bronze mountings. On the bookcases are the different quarterings of the arms of the Prince of Wales. The state drawing-room is a noble apartment, about 70ft. by 30ft. It faces the south side, having a garden front looking towards the park, but complete shut-off from it, at least in the lower rooms, by the garden wall. In this room great taste has been shown in the decoration and furnishing. The walls are panelled with rose-pink silk of splendid manufacture, the mouldings being formed of white and gold. The ceiling is tinted to correspond, and, as well as the cornice, is ornamented with white and gold. The entrance doors are panelled in silk. The carpet is a beautiful Axminster, the pattern the same as that in the Council Chamber at Buckingham Palace. Among the chandeliers, which are of Etruscan design, in colours effectively contrasting with the centres. The sofas and chairs are white and gold, and covered with rose silk. There are four pairs of rarely inlaid cabinets, with ormoulu ornaments, and on each of these four pairs of magnificent Sèvres vases, the white ground of which is in perfect keeping with the rose-pink silk. Over the cabinets are four pictures by Gainsborough Dighton, Vivic, Chancer, Spenser, Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, Moore, Scott, and Byron, on an elegant inlaid table, a perfect copy of the celebrated Florentine mosaic table, illustrative of the arts and sciences. The chandeliers in this room are the most splendid pieces of the kind which we have seen. There are three of them, the centre one somewhat larger than the two others. They are Venetian in style, and are composed of upwards of about 5000 drops. At the top of each chandelier is a crystal figure, surmounted by a coronet, and a band of crystal drops. From this are four streamers of glass, which droop over in most graceful and elegant forms. The lights are placed in the centre, surrounded by prisms of richly-cut glass. The lower part, in which the candles are placed, is formed of a cluster of glass drops, which, placed as they are, mixed with all the colours of gems, and at night have a remarkably fine effect. From the centre of the ceiling, and from the cornice, are suspended a number of smaller ones, which carry elegantly cut globes, each of which sparkles almost with the brilliancy of the chandeliers. The dining-room is a noble and spacious apartment, about 50ft. by 25ft. The sideboard is a magnificent piece of work. The centre-piece is a model of Eddystone Lighthouse, beautifully carved with fruits and flowers, and enriched with gold. The curtains are crimson, and gold. The chandelier is of ormoulu, and of remarkably splendid Venetian centre, of Minton's manufacture. The arrangement of the rooms is admirably adapted for the convenience of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the furnishing and decorations of the State apartments of Marlborough House reflect much credit on English manufactures. The furniture which is for the Prince, Spitalfields and Manchester have supplied the silk and damask, and Witton the Kidderminster carpets, while the furniture has been made entirely in London workshops.

THE QUAYS OF PARIS.—No. II.

In this day's Impression we continue the series commenced in the number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for Aug. 17, 1861. Our readers will probably recognise the subject of our first Paper on the Quays, the heart and origin of that now great capital. The Palace of Justice and the Tribunal of Commerce, the Conciergerie, and the Prefecture of the Gallic Sovereign. We are here in the so-called island of the City, the population of which is almost entirely composed of persons connected with the administration of law and religion continue to haunt the island nucleus of what has since become one of the greatest of European Powers. It is a curious fact that the centre of Paris is the richest on account of its antiquity, many marks of which it still retains.

Looking from left to right across our first Engraving, we find a hundred years ago a corner house occupied by the Tribunal of Commerce is of to-day—nay, is still in course of construction on the site of what was formerly one of the fashionable residences of Paris, the Hôtel de Lamoignon. Quay, a favourite resort for all classes of Parisians, who are constantly found in the open air. Behind the Tribunal is also new, connecting the island with the main land, which Festival Bridge, the Pont Neuf, the Conciergerie, the Palace of Sebastopol. But parts of the Palace of Justice and the Sainte-Chapelle are very old, and bear the stamp of their age, as altogether they are a curious mixture of the ancient and modern. Again, looking westward, we catch a glimpse, at the end of the Quai de la Mégisserie, of the new Tribunal of Commerce, and of the Imperial Government of Napoleon III. by the addition of the New Louvre, each portion worthy of the other, though constructed in different styles, and indeed interwoven—each also a monument of its period; for, whereas the Old Louvre required some centuries for its completion, the New Louvre, the Napoleonic portion, was completed within less than five years from its commencement.

Our second Engraving shows, on the left hand, a wide view of the island, connected on each side with the main land by the oldest bridge in Paris, the Pont Neuf, in the centre of which is the equestrian statue of Henry IV. of France, commanding the extremity of the island. The opposite extremity of the island is occupied by the Cathedral of Notre Dame, which was begun in the year 1163, continued in 1604, during the reign of Henry IV. It was formerly, like many ancient churches, surrounded by numerous houses, but these disappear till 1854, when the bridge underwent a number of alterations for the purpose of putting it in harmony with the architectural progress of the present Imperial capital. A new monumental fountain was attached to this neighbourhood. The room below the attic of one of the houses forming the quadrangle of the Quai de l'Horloge, the Quai and the Pont Neuf, was inhabited for some time by Napoleon Bonaparte when a young officer of artillery, previous to the Revolution. It bears an inscription recording the fact to be inscribed on the front of the house, which is otherwise unworthy of special remark.

The house at the corner of the quay on the second figure is a large for the sale of charcoal, the combustible generally employed for the purpose of cooking in Paris. It is advertised as "Charbon de Paris," most of the coal-barges met with at intervals on the River Seine. The building contains numerous compartments for the storage of charcoal, one of those large bathing establishments so popular in Paris under the name of Ecoles de Natation, or swimming-schools. The baths are supplied in some instances from the water-basin Basin Henri IV., and called from the immediate vicinity of the statue of that favourite monarch.

With these few preliminary remarks we proceed to the descriptive details of some of the principal buildings represented in our two Illustrations.

FIRST ILLUSTRATION.

1. The Tribunal of Commerce.—The Tribunal of Commerce has hitherto transacted its business in the Exchange, or Bourse; but, the numerous duties of the Tribunal having increased, it has become a separate edifice, the construction of which has been confided to Bailly, one of the architects of the city of Paris, to whom we are indebted for the new Prefecture de police, and other works in our article. The site for the new Tribunal of Commerce has been well chosen, for it is contiguous to the Palace of Justice. It has, however, where all the courts, civil and criminal, will thus be concentrated.

2. The Conciergerie.—The Conciergerie is the name given to the smallest of the religious edifices in Paris, but it is at the same time one of the most beautiful. This fine monument dates from the Middle Ages (1180), and takes the Great Revolution. Its interior has not been celebrated within its walls, and it had for some time become the reception for the prisoners of the Seine. It has, however, recently undergone a complete restoration. The spire and the single tower of the Conciergerie are generally looked upon as two of the finest productions of church architecture.

3. The Palace of Justice.—The Palace of Justice is the great central point for the Law Courts of Paris, whether civil or criminal. The building is of several periods, and its origin is almost lost in antiquity. The only remains of the palace as it stood in the time of St. Louis are the clock tower and the two other towers seen a little further on, the Tower of Montgomery, and the Tower of Bonbec. It was formerly used to exhibit condemned criminals on a scaffold erected in the interior of the courtyard of the Palace, and the Salle des Pas Perdus was the scene of the principal façade: but this practice is no longer observed. The Salle des Pas Perdus, or Hall of Lost Steps, the palace as far as the Foot Bridge, half of which is seen in fig. 1, is sometimes called the Quai des Lonettes, or Spectacle Quay, on account of the number of opticians and print-sellers who frequent it.

4. St. Chapelle.—This is an entirely new church, constructed in imitation of the Gothic of the thirteenth century. It was commenced in 1846, and terminated in about ten years. The two elegant spires commanding the Palace façade are a graceful addition to the series of splendid monuments seen from the Place de la Concorde.

5. Quai de la Mégisserie.—On crossing the new bridges from the Palais de Justice (the Pont au Change) the great artery of the Boulevard of Sebastopol is directly facing us, and on the left-hand side the Quai de la Mégisserie, leading to the Old Louvre, a portion of which is visible in our Illustration.

SECOND ILLUSTRATION.

1. Place Dauphine.—The Place Dauphine is situated at the end of a very short street, immediately opposite the statue of Henry IV. This place, triangular in form, is one of the last vestiges of the very old Paris. The houses surrounding it are nearly built in 1608. In the centre of it there is a fountain, erected in 1803, in honour of Gen. Desaix, one of Napoleon's best Generals. Behind the fountain is the entrance to the Prefecture of Police, the Passport Office, and, in fine, all the offices connected with the administration of the interior of the French Empire.

2. Sir Secrète, already alluded to in our previous article on the Quays of Paris.

3. La Vallée.—The old market called La Vallée has long been the place for the sale of the live and dead poultry consumed in the French capital. It is a low, covered building, entered by several arched gateways. The basement of the building is still shortly to be covered to the Halles Centrales, where a pavilion is being prepared expressly for the sale of poultry.

4. The Mint.—The principal façade of the Paris Mint looks on to the Quay Conti, which has also the honour of possessing the Institute of France. The present building dates from 1775: it was constructed by James Antoine, an eminent architect of that period. It is of a seventy-seven feet in length. Yards long on the banks from the river, and consists of three stories, each of which has twenty-seven openings on the front façade. The Mint of Paris is not only a great monetary commission, under the authority of which are placed the few subordinate Mints still existing in the French Empire.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY.

THE Parisian season has during the past month been in the plenitude of its éclat. Gaiety and amusement have been kept by a long continuance of such admirable weather as is rarely encountered even in Paris. Long during the month of April, the races, the reviews, and the timehonoured fêtes connected with Longchamps, have helped to make memorable for the frequent display of the spring toilets of the most elegant women of Europe. They have followed their fashionable leaders in crowds to the turf, to the Bois, and to the promenade. The Empress assisted, in an open carriage with the Prince and grand-duke of Saxony, at the Bois de Boulogne on the 21st ult., and her Majesty's attire on that, as on many recent occasions, was remarked for its quiet simplicity, which cannot fail to have a beneficial influence on the fashion which has for some time prevailed even in very high quarters. The Impératrice-Reine was accompanied to the review by a squadron of Amazones d'Afrique on their beautiful Arabs—wore a small white bonnet, lower in front than of late, fringe combined by the ribbon, and trimmed tout simplement with black velvet. The form of the shape chosen for the spring is thus undoubtedly fixed; but the choice of material may still remain, and does remain, at discretion. A dress of silver, entirely of light blue, green, or pink crape, without any other ornament either on the dress or on the bonnet, is a favourite evening remark, as do also the coloured horsehair bonnets, which have much encroached of late on the domain of the old-fashioned straw hat.

Several novelties for the shoulders have just made their appearance. We have especially remarked a burnous in white woollen lace, very elegant in its form, and which, if not the one of our own country we have noticed at the International Exhibition, is particularly strong; it has likewise the merit of being novel, and is to be had at a shop conferred in the latter form. The woollen-lace burnous, lined with pink, blue, or violet, is adapted for carriage dress, for which it is altogether fitting, whereas the shape of the same burnous, if worse no lined, is better suited for walking. The stone-coloured light cloth mantles, ornamented with passementerie, introduced in the form of a cape, are also very pretty, worn over dark dresses, either plain or with a simple trimming at the bottom of the skirt.

The foulard des Indes is certainly the material en permanence, for it is equally patronised in all seasons. The various shades of nutbrown, from chestnut to the deepest velvet, are particularly affected by those who follow the mode of the Court even to the choice of a colour. Light-blue foulard is also much worn, and appears to enjoy a fair share of patronage from persons whose taste is unexceptionable.

We may remark in passing that the fancy for stalking straw bonnet ribbons and trimmings of ribbon are light, delicate, and doubtful as to the tint, and that the ordinary blues, pinks, magentas, and violets are, for a time at least, discarded.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Robe of mauve-coloured taffety or moire antique, ornamented at the bottom of the skirt with a flounce of black passementerie edged with tufts of chenille. The long waistband, the cordage, and narrow sleeves are trimmed with black lace and corresponding trimmings. Light pink crape bonnet decorated with feathers and lace; pink silk bow and strings.

Fig. 2. Ball Dress.—Robe of tarlatane de bal is of lavender moire antique, forming tunic, drawn up and seemingly attached by two pendant bouquets of convolvulus. The tunic is of white tarlatane with narrow black lace on the two edges, the lower one festooned. The corsage is in harmony with the tunic, and is trimmed with flowers, to which the ornamentation of the jockey-sleeves is also made to correspond.

Fig. 3. Evening Dress.—Light brown foulard robe, the bottom and each side of the front of the skirt being provided with a black waterdrop trimming. Of the same material is the corsage depicted in the illustration. The small black velvet vest is one of a series now coming again into fashion: it has a trimming of corresponding velvet piping. Narrow Parisian collar. The cap is composed of black lace and blond: the upright portion in front is entirely of lace, and is moreover enlivened by a large white feather.

Fig. 4. Dress for a Little Girl.—Stone-coloured alpaca frock and pelisse, ornamented with coloured trimming. Hat of straw, of the same colour as the frock, and trimmed with green velvet bow and band. Narrow muslin collar and undersleeves.

THE SPECTRE DRAMA AT THE POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.

We have already sufficiently indicated our readers into the mysteries of this ingenious optical illusion, as presented by Professor Pepper; nor is it necessary to state that the exhibition of this strange effect has become one of the great "lions" of the season. It has, indeed, nearly a nine-days' wonder. Since its first representation additions have been made to the scenes which have been produced, and it is probable that new forms will yet be discovered and shown. The invention is due to the experiments made by Henry Dircks, Esq., C.E., and is capable of considerable application. The illusion to the stage was early suggested; but, owing to the run of sensation dramas, its assistance was not yet brought into requisition. The Wet-nod discovery Action, however, the invention has been theatrically utilised by Mr. Lane, the proprietor of the Polytechnic Institution, who had a piece written for the purpose of introducing the spectre. A clergyman's widow appears after death to a Baronet by whom she has been murdered, and he passes his wife and child. THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.—The sixth report of the trustees of the National Portrait Gallery has just been published. It amounts to 111. In comparison with former years, very much fewer portraits have been presented during the past twelvemonth, and the collection of the gallery during last season, a fact readily accounted for by the want of interest at the time of the Exhibition of 1862. Of the 111 portraits now added and attributable in a great measure to the same influence, the numbers of which have been increased by the Exhibition of 1862, and which, opened from May 1 to Nov. 1, inclusive, were augmented to nearly double what they had been in the previous year. The total number of visitors during the whole term of the International Exhibition; and the average attendance during those days when the gallery was open, was twice as large as that which was bestowed by Mr. H. W. Merrin, amounting to nearly thousands in number, in the process of engraving, and ultimately intended for purposes of reference. They include portraits of all ages and all countries. From the small number of portraits that were offered for sale during the past year, as already explained, the trustees have cautioned no practical inconvenience from the lesser amount of the annual grant, £1000 instead of £2000. They would, however, think it a matter of regret if there were to be any such permanent diminution as to compel them to forego any favourable opportunities of purchase, which sometimes very suddenly arise. In concluding their report the trustees observe that no price fell step has yet been taken to remove the gallery to better quarters, and that they "continue to contend with the difficulties which present themselves from a growing collection in a most inadequate space, and which, without any fault on their side, must give rise, on the part of visitors, to frequent and well-founded complaints.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Elements of International Law, by Henry Wheaton, LL.D.: second annotated edition, by William Beach Lawrence. (Sampson Low, Son, and Co.) The fame of Wheaton as an expounder of international law is universal, and therefore an edition of his great work could never be untimely; but at the present epoch it seems particularly appropriate. We have it here in one portly volume, well printed, and with a copious index, admitting of ready reference. It is edited by the same gentleman who, in 1855, prepared an annotated edition of Mr. Wheaton's work, with the author's latest additions, and contains remarks by the editor upon the case of the Trent, the recognition of the Italian confederation proclamation, upon the constitution of prize courts, and upon other points now more than usually interesting. It is not for us to pronounce upon their value—we leave that to jurists and politicians. Our duty is done when we have commended the book to public attention. We may be pardoned, however, if we quote from the "Notice of the Author," prefixed to the work, the following eulogy from the pen of Mr. Lawrence—"We cannot contemplate the character without a passing tribute to the character, the learning, and the virtues of a man who is a great international jurist, and who has left a fame behind." We feel constrained also to express our astonishment at not seeing in the "Notice" the date of Mr. Wheaton's death. We were certainly not able to spare the time to look for it with superhuman diligence, but such care as we were able to employ in the search was unsuccessful; and the omission, we trust, is due to our assuming it, should surely have been looked to in the second edition.

The Naturalist on the Amazons, by Henry Walter Bates (2 vols. Murray). What may be the value, in a scientific point of view, of these volumes, we must leave to the more skilful to determine; we shall have performed our own task when we have accounted for their appearance, and pointed out how far they are likely to interest the general reader. Mr. Bates, then, urged by the wonder to the world which a residence of eleven years in the regions which he describes, principally from a naturalist's point of view, rendered him peculiarly fit. His object was to gather together facts "towards solving the problem of the origin of species," and, when we mention that the author of the country in which he sojourned longest was, up to that time, entirely unexplored by the naturalist, and that he there collected of mammalia, birds, reptiles, fishes, insects, molluscs, and crustacea 8000 species new to science, we have said enough to show that his researches must have been abundantly obtained. He is a master of men of science in all countries. In fact, as Mr. Bates himself remarks, "there are now comparatively few busy men of science or learned men in different parts of Europe." The author returned home in 1859, and he excuses the apparent delay in the publication of his narrative on the ground of depression of health and spirits consequent upon a long residence within four degrees of the equator. We consider the excuse to say at all hom somewhat superfluously valid, and we are sincerely glad that he has so far recovered from that melancholy condition as to have been enabled to put the results in his page, as to have been enabled at length to enrich our literature with a work which, setting science aside, is not only instructive but entertaining. Mr. Bates has not, to an scientific extent, confined himself to describe the men, women, and manners he encountered in his wanderings. He has given wandering scientific matters, which, read by the unscientific, will be found intelligible and interesting. Everyone can appreciate the description of the Indian method of and an ant-eater, and can understand the satisfaction with which Mr. Bates, having had the courage to dine upon the latter, must have discovered it to taste like a cross of goose. Everyone has heard of the bird-killing spider, and probably considered him a myth, but Mr. Bates was actually a witness of the fact that "a large hairy spider of the genus Mygale,' really does prey upon small birds. Every one, however ignorant of natural history, must sympathise with him at the mocking propensities and man-wounding properties of bats, and will read with interest Mr. Bates's confirmatory evidence upon the point. Every one is capable of sympathising with a gentleman who finds, to his disgust and astonishment, that a certain gadfly prefers to anything else, as a breeding-place for its grub, the calf of the human leg. Mr. Bates's father kept a school. At the age of eight 70 Blondield (as he was called from his diminutive size) was sent to Mary Cranmore School, then under Mr. Becker. He here showed strong symptoms of that talent, inclined to the study which ultimately led him to the Episcopal chair, on which his boyish mind was bent; for in his schooldays, when asked what profession he intended to adopt, he answered, "I mean to be a Bishop." At eighteen he went to Cambridge as a pensioner of Trinity College, where he fell in with Monk, afterwards Professor of Greek and Bishop of Lincoln, and with many kindred spirits. His brilliant degree and his subsequent career as editor of "Æschylus" are, of course, as matters of history, well known in these circles. His quarrels with Butler, Parr, Parker, O. T. N. (of Thetford, Norfolk), and others, are perhaps better forgotten than revived. In 1810 Mr. Blomfield was ordained and married. He refused a most ingenious offer and accepted the carsey of Chesterford, a parish in which Gambier, Jones, Bennet, Jones, and Bowdler had been stopping the scandals connected with Newmarket races. In 1818 he lost his wife, whom he had six children, though only one lived beyond infancy, and in 1819 he married again. By his second marriage he had eleven children, of whom one died in infancy. In 1820 Mr. Blomfield had conferred upon him the honorary degree of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate; and, being allowed to retain the living of Chesterford, was able to use the largeness of his income for the first time in his life to enjoy a comfortable independence without the labour of teaching." Whether learning to consider wealth a "comfortable independence" ought to be the first consideration of a candidate for a bishopric, we shall go on to 1824, when he accepted the see of Chester, knowing, though it was an extraordinary piece of luck, enough to retain the living of Bishopsgate in commendam. In 1828 he was offered and accepted the see of London, which he held, as we have supposed, than any Bishop before him ever did, or after him will do. In 1856 he was laid to his rest, on the 5th of August, in his 71st year. We shall not here write a description of his character; we shall leave that to be drawn for themselves by readers of his son's book; but should any such ask us what memorial the Bishop has left behind him, we should ask the inquirer to go go with us to Bethnal-green, and, pointing to the churches which have been erected by Bishop Blomfield's care, should reply, si monumentum requiris, circumspice.

Heart and Cross, by the Author of "Margaret Maitland." (Hurst and Blackett.) The name of this story is taken from a name wherein a certain Colonel Nugent, who distinguished himself in the battles which were common in the Indian wars, engraved a heart and a cross (with the invisible accompaniment of his heart) upon the chain of Miss Grahame, who had loved him for eight years, and who now had her love reciprocated, and had been almost driven by despair to take up strong views upon the subject of women and their rights and more and their demerits. The story is slight, hurried, gossipping, full of flirtations, foreshadowings of marriages, housewifely talk, upbraidings of a superfluous bachelor—a fellow of his college—and eulogies of children, with an episode which tells of the harsh treatment of a clever cripple by a heartless lout. There are no thrilling incidents, nor is the tale remarkable for artistic finish. What we mean to say is that more than half the characters might be omitted for any influence they exercise upon the main event; nor is the most intimate fate rendered easy to imagine; but one is the more reconciled to the treatment, inasmuch as the interest excited by any of them is far from intense.

Things to be Remembered in Daily Life, by John Timbs, F.S.A. (W. Kent and Co.) Mr. Timbs's "Things Not Generally Known," and other compilations of a similar character, have met with so much success that we have little doubt but that a similar reception awaits this new volume from his pen. He treats in the present instance of many more things than it would be easy in a short time to enumerate; but amongst them we think it right to mention "Life and Length of Days," "Education at Home," "Unsound Education," "Character and Handwriting," "Bone hunting," "Anecdotes of Families," and "Marvels of the Universe," as themes upon which the public will be glad to have Mr. Timbs's views. We do not, as a rule, like this author; we need not enter into tedious detail in a description of his publication. It may be understood at once that there is a great deal of useful matter condensed in a small compass.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECTATOR.—The great-grandson of the Queen of Pennsylvania. Mr. Richard Penn, who died at a very advanced age last week, was the author of the entertaining book "Maxims and Hints for an Angler and Miscellaneous Observations on the Art of Shooting Flying," published in 1814. In his 82nd year he was still a keen sportsman and a first-rate chess amateur and one of the standard anglers of the time.

A.—If the King of either player is placed in check, and the check is not announced or illustrated until one or more moves have been made, all moves subsequently made must be retracted, and the player ought to have announced the check must make some other move.

E. L. M.—It shall be duly reported on.

J. Bell, of Lewes.—We have not space to score for the check, but shall be very glad of a game, if you will send one.

REJECTED.—The Letter on Chess," published by Spinkle and Marshall in 1846, which are the Problems and Games between the Germans at Purdy, Fort, are now known to have been written by, or at the inspiration of, Mr. W. Lewis, the celebrated chessplayer and writer on the game.

J. Lees.—Look at it again, and you will see your error.

C. G.—A charming combination, but not, as you suppose, a novelty. It was published in the BELL'S LIFE CHESS COLUMNS a long time since.

S., Hillsborough.—There is certainly no reason why the game should be confined to the number of moves you mention, and we have frequently played games of 100 moves and upwards without any limit. It scarcely credible that two fair and skilful players of equal strength, will only play a hundred moves in a game of chess.

A. N., Leamington.—You are fairly entitled to the honour of having correctly solved the Problem, and we congratulate you upon it.

J. B., Dublin.—Devil's White and Black Knight, E. M. T., Dr. Mackenzie, Rabbi Hirsh, S. of Devon: A Barbarian, Lex Aurea-ryan, Victoria, Rook, F. de S., W. B., Local, Hermion, C. Clare, Chemicus, F. T., Dr. Forbes, Dr. Bunnett, Dr. Wilson, A. Z., Gemma, Cassius', F., of Ely: D., Cosmo, Puritan, Rose, T. C. D., are correct. All others are wrong.

MORE BLINDFOLD CHESS-PLAY.—Mr. Maczuski, of whose remarkable performance in playing eight games blindfold we recently had occasion to speak a few weeks ago, has been astonishing the assizetown of Lynne by exhibiting his wonderful powers of play. He is said to have accomplished the greatest feat on Saturday last, playing against twenty-one antagonists, and to have won seven of the ten games, drawn two, and lost only one.

CHESS IN PARIS.—From a lively article in the current number of the Saturday Review, it appears that the Regent Street of Paris, which has rarely hitherto consented for beyond the club and coffee houses, is rapidly gaining ground among all classes of the community. It is not merely that at the famous Café de la Regence sufficient accommodation cannot be provided for the players, and that in various quarters where formerly the sole amusements were billiards and dominoes we have now regularly established chessclubs, but the game has invaded even the sanctuary of the noble Faubourg and the Chaussée d'Antin. In the most aristocratic circles there are weekly meetings at which chess and music are the similar ministers of the amusement, and attended by the most distinguished amateurs of chess. Two of the most fashionable of those private meetings are those which are held at the houses of Count Casabianca and Count Bernis. In some of the most exclusive VIEWS IN MADAGASCAR.

We this week present our readers with a series of Views in Madagascar, engraved from drawings kindly forwarded to us by Lieutenant F. P. Oliver, of the Royal Artillery. It is not improbable that this interesting country, extending over an area larger than that of Great Britain and Ireland, and possessing four millions of an intelligent and skilful population, will before long attract the attention of Europe. Until lately it has been known chiefly from the reports of missionaries, who, visiting the island in the beginning of the present century, were cordially welcomed by the King and people, and succeeded so well in their pious task that, during the ten years of their uninterrupted residence there, the Christian religion may be said to have been firmly planted in the island. The missionaries were accompanied by a number of intelligent artisans, under whose instruction many of the Malagasy youth were trained to be carpenters, builders, tanners, carriers, shoemakers, &c. But, upon the death of the enlightened monarch Radama I., in 1828, evil days were in store for Madagascar. The nephew whom he had nominated as his successor was assassinated, and his widow ascended the throne. For a time the schools and religious teaching of the missionaries were tolerated, but before long the policy of the Government underwent a change—the profession of the Christian religion was prohibited, and the native believers barbarously persecuted. A collision, which occurred some years later between the native authorities and the French and English Governments, had the effect of widening the breach still more, and it was not until the death of the Queen and the accession to the throne of her son, Radama II., in the spring of last year, that the country became again opened to the old influences of religion and civilisation. The new King had always been noted for his attachment to European habits; and both England and France hastened to acknowledge him and to establish friendly relations with him. The King received his European visitors gladly and hospitably, and expressed the greatest desire to avail himself of the blessings of Christianity and education.

We append the following description of the scenes and subjects which we have this week engraved:—

FERRY OVER THE RIVER MANGORO, AT ANDAKANA.

This view is taken from the eastern bank of the river, just below the village of Andakana, and looking in the direction of the lofty ranges of Ankove, of which the two principal mountains, Angavo and Itody are to be seen. The Mangoro at this spot is from fifty to sixty yards across, and flows between steep banks, whose flat summits, as shown in the Engraving, exhibit the level of the extensive plains which stretch north and south to the horizon, with a breadth of about fifteen miles. The river rises to the north of Angavo, and receives the waters of the streams flowing from the mountains which form the watershed of the centre of the island. It flows to the south of the forest-clad mountains of Analamazaotra, and falls into the sea about one hundred miles south of Andevorunto. Andakana is about thirty miles east of Antananarivo, the capital of Madagascar, and on the road thence to Tamatave on the sea coast.

VIEWS OF THE COUNTRY NEAR AMBATOMANGA, SOUTH-EAST OF AMBOHIMMUN, AND OF ANGARO KELI, BETWEEN ANKERA MADINIKA AND AMBATOMANGA.

Both these views are of spots lying close to the capital, Antananarivo, and upon the road thence to the port of Tamatave. Ambatomanga is about eighteen miles from the capital.

Angaro Keli is a small homestead or farm on the Down, near Mount Angavo. The figure seated in the chair is that of Lieutenant Oliver, sketching. His four bearers are squatting around until his work done, he should give the word to proceed on his journey.

THE FALLS OF ANEVOCA.

This cascade is one of the most picturesque spots on the route from the capital to the sea. It is about half way between the villages of Beforona and Analamazaotra, in the forest of that name, and near the small hamlet of Anevoca.

The falls are on the right of the path which skirts the stream forming them for a considerable distance. Although some twenty yards broad, the trees and foliage meet overhead, affording a delightful protection against the rays of the tropical sun. The water has forced itself through the rocks in several long fissures, through which the torrent rushes, foaming, into a chasm some thirty or forty feet below, and is again succeeded by a series of falls and rapids amongst boulders and huge slabs of granite rock, which lie scattered in every conceivable shape and position, exhibiting the force of the floods during the rainy season. Palanquins, the usual means of conveyance of the country, are seen in the fore ground of the group of travellers halting for refreshment.

PROCESSION OF THE KING AND COURT OF MADAGASCAR TO THE EXECUTION GROUND, AMBOHIPOTSI.

RESIDENCE OF THE LATE CHIEF OF AMBATONANGA.

This sketch calls for no especial remark. The house, having been built of wood and not properly painted, has fallen into bad repair.

THE PALACE GATE, ANTANANARIVO, THE CAPITAL OF MADAGASCAR.

The principal entrance to the palace is at the northern end of the court-yard. It consists of an arched gateway approached by a flight of twelve stone steps, the ground on which the palace stands being 100 above the level of the road. Under this arch lounge the guard. Two sentries, with muskets and bayonets fixed and crossing one another, bar the entry, and no person is allowed to pass except with the permission of the officer of the guard, unless he be an officer of the palace. A sentry is surrounded by the ho ho an officer of the palace. A sentry is surrounded by the "Voromahery" ("the powerful bird") of Madagascar. The strange-shaped piece of woodwork painted red and black was originally the frame of a looking-glass, and is now by no means ornamental. The gate has a lightning-conductor connected with it, as indeed has every building of any importance in Ambanamoro. On each side of the gateway is a small brass fieldpiece, the bracket-trails of which are more adapted for their cramped position than for service in the field. The roof covered with imbricated tiles in the foreground is that of the practising-room of the King's brass band. Opposite it is the guard-house, and to the left the keeper of the gate. On the horizon is seen the northern end of the Great Palace, 120 ft. in height, and painted white from top to bottom with the exception of the balustrade of the extensive verandahs.

ANTANANARIVO, FROM LAKE ANOSY.

The view shows the south-western portion of the capital as seen from the north-west corner of the lake. This lake, with the palace on the island in the centre of it, is called Anosy; from the north of the island it takes a sharp bend, which gives the lake in a semicircular form at its base, and on its summit is situated the suburb of Soraky. Beyond the lake is the extensive parade ground of Mahamasina, on which is raised the circular white pleister platform surrounding the sacred stone with the canopy ready erected over it for the festival.—the sacred stone with the canopy ready erected over it for the festival.—the ceremonies of King Radama II. From the foreground across the lake is 700 yards; beyond this the parade-ground extends for 1,000 yards, the base of the rock on which the city stands, which rises nearly perpendicularly to a height of 600 ft. In a direct line beyond and above the extensive tombs in the rock; under the overhanging cliffs which condemned persons were buried, and where a good many Christians suffered martyrdom. On the right are the houses of the Christians suffered martyrdom. On the right are the houses of the Christians suffered Ambohimahamasy, and between this and the town central hill called Ambohimalaza, and between this and the town the lines thread to Imisiraun Palace. In the distance, on the extreme left, is the hamely of Ambohidratrimo, which is built on the dreary execution ground designated Ambohipotsy, where criminals were executed either by precipitation, spearing, or being burned alive. Next to it is the hill named Tsimpohabibo, directly in the line passing over the Palace of Anosi, is a one-gun battery of 6-pounders. The fort on the right is signal-station in nature. In the centre, and crowning the whole, is the Great Palace; and in its immediate neighbourhood, on the house of the Judges, nobles, and principal officers of the Government.

PROCESSION OF THE KING AND COURT OF MADAGASCAR HE EXECUTION GROUND, AMBOHIPOTSY.

It will be observed that the King's guards surround the party as well as the executioners and irregulars. The procession will allow. In the rear of the guard the singing women, Tsimandrave, follow, singing their usual sad ringing air. The King comes next in the party. He is dressed upon this occasion in a suit of undyed rough silk and a small hunting cap of no fabric. Upon his breast is the Star of Order of Tritane Radamala, the family next in rank to the Star of Madagascar. The upright rock seen in the Engraving marks the spot where Rabehevitra, the Christian martyr, was burned to death in 1861. To Lady Macdonald, his relict, he leaves certain property in England and Canada for her life. The remainder of his estate and effects for which he had the power of disposition he bequeaths in certain proportion between his daughter, Miss Anne Jane Macdonald, and her brother, Hugh Alexander Bin son and heir, Colonel Macdougall (who married a daughter of Lieutenant-General Sir J. Nicholl, K.C.B.), and, as stated in the codicil executed for the, testator simply bequeaths to him a valuable sword, presented to him (Sir Duncan) by the field officers of the 79th Highlanders when in Spain.

The will of Alexander M'Kenzie Ross, C.E., late of the city of Montreal, in Canada, and of Ladbroke-gardens, has just been proved in London. His eminent engineer died at the latter place on June 16, in August last, having executed his will in 1860, appointing Edward L. Bette, Esq., of Broom Hall, Kent, and his (testator) nephew, Alexander Ross, of Woburn-square, executors and trustees. The personal property in this country was sworn under £70,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife the income in his property in England, Canada, and elsewhere, and, upon her decease, directs the same to be divided amongst his children. To the latter he leaves all his presentation plate, which, with other relics, are to descend as heirlooms to his posterity; but he also bequeaths to his son Alexander his professional books in engineering, in expectation of his pursuing that profession. To his sister-in-law, the widow of his late brother, he leaves a legacy of £500 per annum and kindness to his children.

The will of George Lake, Esq., formerly of Higham, but late of Tyndalwy, Kent, was proved in London, on the 13th inst., by the surviving executors and trustees—namely, Robert Lake, the testator's son and heir-at-law, the testator-in-law, the other executor, Mr. Henry Lake, the brother, having died before the testator, whose death occurred in February last, having executed his will in 1861. The personal estate was sworn under £60,000. The testator states that he is possessed of property in Kent, which he leaves at his pecuniary dispositions. To each of his four sisters he has left a legacy of £500 and to his brother-in-law the sum of £1,000. He also remembers them, or to their widows and children. Legacies of £750 to each of his nephews and nieces. Legacies also are left to servants according to his standing, attention and kindness to his children.

Mr. Thomas Bell, Esq., of Ashbourne-hall, Derbyshire, who died on the 28th of last March, at Cheltenham, in his seventy-third year of his age, was the representative of the Gonsome branch of the illustrious family of Bell, of Bellingham. He left issue by his wife, Mary Anne, daughter of Mr. Thomas Knapp, Esq., of Northampton, two sons and two daughters, Mary Anne, Baroness Wynford, by whom he has had six sons and three daughters. He is succeeded in his marquisate and large estates by his eldest son, Count Rudolph Bentinck, now tenth Marquis Grimaldi.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR G. C. LEWIS, BART., M.P.

The Right Hon. Sir George Cornewall Lewis, Bart., second Baronet, of the Harpton Court, in the county of Radnor, Secretary of State for War, M.P. and P.C., a distinguished statesman and writer, was the eldest son of Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis, fourth daughter of Sir George Cornewall, Baronet, of Moccas Court, in the county of Hereford, by Thomas Frankland Lewis, who, successively Vice-Treasurer of Ireland, Treasurer of the Navy, and Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law Board, was created a Baronet in 1846. He was born on the 27th of June, 1806. His son, George Cornewall Lewis, the subject of this notice, was born on the 21st of October, 1806, and received his earlier education at Eton School and Christchurch, Oxford, and there carried off many prizes. He after words became a student of the Inner Temple, and was called to the Bar in 1831, but never practised. He was appointed in 1828, having a first-class in classics and a double first in mathematics, and after having studied with a special pleader (Mr. Pennock), was called to the Bar on the 25th of November, 1831, and in the same year was appointed a Commissioner to inquire into the Municipal Corporations of Ireland, which were to be framed by the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple, but did not complete the inquiry in that case, being employed by the Government in several important commissions of inquiry. In the following year he was appointed one of the Poor Law Commissioner in January, 1833, and retained the office till August, 1847. In 1839 he was returned to Parliament, in the Whig interest, for Herefordshire, and became one of the same year he was made Secretary to the Board of Control, which office he held till January, 1841. He then became Secretary to the Home Department. He was subsequently, from July, 1850, to February, 1852, Secretary of the Treasury. On succeeding the Earldom of Clarendon, on the 27th of January, 1853, and was, in his father's stead, elected M.P. for the Radnor district of Radnorshire, which he represented till 1855, when he was defeated, and he retired with his party in 1858. On their return to office, in 1859, Sir George was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which office he remained till 1861, when he acquired a high and deserved reputation for administrative capacity. On the resignation of Lord Palmerston, on the death of Lord Herbert, Sir George Lewis was appointed Secretary of War, which office he had administered so well, for the War Department, that on the formation of Lord Palmerston's last Ministry, he was appointed to any official duty he undertook, that in this new sphere he worked most energetically and successfully, and was universally regretted when he died, and, as truly observed by Mr. Disraeli when responding to the motion which was unanimously carried in the House of Commons for a public funeral, "in that death, lost one of her best servants, and the Commons a member of it who was universally respected." Sir George was a man of letters, and was no less distinguished as an author, and his literary works will long be read with high interest. His last work was "An Inquiry into the best Form of Government," was published only a few weeks before his death. Sir George Lewis married, in 1836, Lady Maria Theresa, daughter of the Hon. George Villiers, and granddaughter of Thomas, Earl of Clarendon, by whom he had issue, one short illness. As he leaves no issue, he is succeeded by his only brother, Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis, Bart., of Harpton Court, Radnorshire, Member, Rural Dean and Rector of Monington-on-Wye, Herefordshire, who was born in 1812, and married, in 1841, Harriet Emily, daughter of the Rev. Edmund Antrobus, Bart., and sister of Edmund Antrobus, Esq., M.P. for Cricklade, and has been a son, Herbert Edmund, and nine daughters, Mary Anne, Harriet, Emily, Jane, Sophia, Frances, Louisa, Elizabeth, and Isabella. The family trace descent in direct male line from Edward Lewis, Esq., of old and honourable lineage in Radnorshire, and, as truly observed by Mr. Disraeli when responding to the motion which was unanimously carried in the House of Commons for a public funeral

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

INDOOR AMUSEMENTS.

CARDS.

Dull and monotonous would the domestic circle or the more extended evening party have been had not innocent amusements been introduced to employ those moments when the mind, fatigued with thought, seeks for relaxation in calm and refined pursuits. Many of the games of chance played by the Romans—that of latrunculi, very similar to modern chess; and the ludus talarum, or dice, a until carried on, the latter too often to the utter destruction of the infatuated gamester; while to ancient Rome may be traced those theatrical representations from which the modern charade is derived—a source of constant recreation in a country home—as also the introduction to us of those instruments of music the tube, the cornua, the buccina, and the lituus, each of which were made of brass, and resembled our trumpet, bugle, bazilly, and cornet-à-piston. Dancing is frequently referred to in the Holy Writ, accompanied by music and singing, as we still practised by savage nations. It would appear that dancing was the natural suggestions of the human mind, for that is now England alone be traced back to the days of Hesperidy. Dancing seems to have been included in the military amusements of the above-mentioned nations, for we find mention of the Salii, "the young persons armed with swords and shields performing the tripudiorum or act. Thereof, too, describes public rejoicings as having place amidst the projecting points of swords and spears (a practice still kept up in Scotland) with so much skill and grace as to excite equal astonishment and admiration. Singing and instrumental music are coeval with dancing, and formed a great part of the convivial meetings of the invading Normans and their immediate successors, many of which the games of chess and dice found general encouragement. We owe, it is affirmed, the invention of cards to our neighbours the French, as they are said to have been devised by a Parisian painter, named Jacquemin Grinagonneur, for the amusement of the unfortunate Charles VI. According to M. St. Foy, these cards were not only painted with the necessary devices and ornaments, but gilt, and probably elegantly executed. All the illuminations on vellum which marked that period—the close of the fourteenth and beginning of the fifteenth century—the above introduction here was a natural consequence of our imitation of all Gallic customs and fashions, though some time must have elapsed before their use became general. In 1463 the ancient laws of England obtained an Act of Parliament to prohibit the importation of playing cards, which was, after a number of years, to be of no effect, except, as we find in the Gazette, A.D. 1834, the following notice:—"That for the better encouragement of the manufacture of playing-cards in England (wherein many hundred poor people are employed), by direction of his Majesty's letters patent (pursuant to charters and directions of the late King James and King Charles), an office is erected in Silver-street, in Bloomsbury, for sealing all playing-cards of English make (which will be there first surveyed), and that the frauds practised in the making of English cards may be prevented, and the foreign cards which are brought in contrary to law may be discovered. The price of all cards will be put upon each pack, to the end that none, under pretence of sealing the cards, may add to the rates of the same; and that, therefore, persons may buy the very best cards shall be sold in London by the last retailer at fourpence the pack, and others at cheaper rates." To return to our topic, cards also appear to have held a great estimation during the reign of Henry VIII., and doubtless long before, for Sir Thomas Elyot, the most celebrated writer of that period, then among the "many games that may be used within the house," the majority of which he commends greatly. Among other amusements he highly approves of dancing, and takes great pains to prove that St. Augustine merely meant to reprove the excesses of the exercise, and by no means to abolish it. He traces the origin of such great ability, and, after describing many ancient modes of dancing, adds:—"Instead of these we have now brought in measures, corantos, galyards, turgyons, and rounds. And as for the special names, they were taken, as they be now, either of the names of the first inventors, or of the measure and number that they do contain; as the cinque pace were of the thity which the song comprehendeth whereof the dance was made. In every of these dances there was a certain gravity and comeliness of body, expressing some pleasant or profitable effects or motion of the mind." Cards, Sir Thomas says, were also in use, and were sent from every step in dancing, which, we learn from him, was invariably commenced in his days by a low reverence from the whole party, with a long interval between it and the first step. Mashes (ladies) would have "pointed a-mort" from the modern polka, waltz, and galop, we will not stop to inquire. Dice he appears to have held in severity. "Oh, why should that be called a play which is compact of malice and robbery? Undoubtedly they are devyses of the devil, invented of things have good cause to suppose Lucifer, Prince of Devils to be the first inventor of disesplaying, although some do write that it was Palamedes invented by Achaius. . . . Cards, I confess is not a more plain figure of idleness than playing at dice, for, besides that therein there is a manner of malice, the players of cards for the whyle play thereat must seem to have no portion of wit or cunning if they will be called fair players; or, in other words, to have little wit or no dagger, if they be taken with any crafty conveyance. How many gentlemen, how many merchants, have in these days made pastimes consumed their substance, as well by their own labours as by their parents', with great study and painful travail in a long time acquired, and finished in a little while and penury! I have seen many godly and bold yeomen hath it brought into theft, whereby they have prevented the course of nature and of life by the law of the land miserably." To return to cards; it is singular that, amidst the rapid march of improvement, cards have, in a great degree, been neglected-that the old deformities of King, Queen, and Knave should be allowed to remain, especially at a time when, through the good taste and liberality of Messrs. Bancroft, Goodall, Reed, Sell, and others, the devices, patterns, and symbols on the backs of the cards have become exquisitely beautiful, and combine with the use as well as pictures the value is to be found in the frame. Whether, as we have already hinted, the origin of playing cards is to be attributed to the asserter of the melancholy and imbecile King of France is a question not easily to be decided, as many contend that the custom was known in China and India long before the period referred to, in that early country had its distinct game; for while at our whist-tables fifty-two cards are used, there will be found in a complete pack of the Oriental Society three Hindoo packs, one containing ninety-six cards and the others a hundred and twenty cards each. In Persia, also, the two packs still in use in which there are seventy-eight cards. The court, or cost cards, as Mr. Chatto, who has written ably upon the subject, calls them, have undergone many alterations since the early period of the Revolution, in 1793-4, various devices were resorted to—Moliere, La Fontaine, Voltaire, and Jean Jacques Rousseau figuring as the four Kings, while Pandora, Judith, Charlotte Corday, and Madame Roland represented the Queens. Well would it be for all card-players if prudence, moderation, and temperance guided their hands, and prudence enabled us to prevent their running into gambling excesses. War, Art, Peace, and Commerce have been patronised; as has the honour of our country and the characters in Schiller's "Jean of Arc." In the latter, Charles VII., Philip of Burgundy, René of Anjou, and Talbot represented the King; and the Duke of Orleans, Dunois, Isabella of Bavaria, and Agnes Sorel, the Queens. At Frankfort, in 1815, some would-be fashionable and ill-natured wags presented Napoleon and Blucher as the knaves of diamonds and clubs. Our Transatlantic brethren have also entertained Washington, Jefferson, and Lafayette as kings upon their playing-cards; four heathen goddesses, Fortune, Ceres, and Minerva, representing the Queens; and four Indian chiefs the knaves.

To enter upon the various games at cards would occupy too much space; suffice it to say, that no more rational evening indoor amusement can be found than that which is devoted to singing, cards, and backgammon. The elderly people may indulge in a rubber of whist, the younger in a pool of commerce, or other round games, while écarté or backgammon may occupy the attention of those to whom what is too scientific and commerce too noisy; and if, for half an hour before bedtime, the dancers can be put into requisition, a simple English ballad be sung, or a quadrille played in which all can take a part, both old and young will retire with a feeling of thankfulness for that delight of all delights—rational, pleasant evening.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE CURIOUS.

New Streets and Old Localities would appropriately describe our column of this week, since it relates to the changes now in progress in the City and Westminster, wherein old and new are brought into strange juxtaposition.

In the works of the projected new street from Blackfriars Bridge to the Mansion House and the Lodgate Railway station and junction, a few localities of interest will disappear, by their association with great names, will be disturbed. The new street will pass directly through the garden of the College of Advocates, situated in Great Knightrider-street and Bennet's-hill. Doctors' Commons, the whole of which will be pulled down, is now for sale. The present house was destroyed in the Great Fire, and rebuilt of brick, in the style that prevailed shortly after: the interior has two quadrangles containing 146 rooms, exclusive of the basement; the courts, dining-room, library, &c., with frontages to Great Knightrider-street and Bennet's-hill, and the Church of St. Benet, Paul's Wharf, on the south. The library is rich in civil law and history, and originally belonged to Sir John Dixon, Judge of the Prerogative Court, by whom it was presented to the college; "such Bishop also makes it a present at his consecration." (Elmes). Had Sir by a Shakspearean locality of the time, the property of the poet, first proprietor of Mr. Halliwell—viz., the site of the house purchased by Shakspeare of Henry Walker, in March, 1612-13, the counterpart of the conveyance of which is preserved in the Guildhall Library, with Shakspeare's signature attached, and which is illustrated in Mr. Halliwell's voluminous work, and dedicated to Fudie Wharfe (Blackfriars), in the east part, right against the King's Majesty's Wardrobe. The very house was, most probably, destroyed in the Great Fire; but the position on the stands upon, at exact site; and, until these few years, it had been tenanted by the Robinson family. Sir Thomas Robinson, Bart., first inhabited this house, in Great Carter-lane, stood the Old Bell Inn, whence, in 1668, Richard Gyppey sends a letter "To my loveing friend and countryman, Mr. Wm. Shackspeare, deliver these"—the only letter addressed to Shakspeare known to exist. The poet was, probably, also the owner of the site of what was noted, in the early construction of the original building, by a richly-sculptured bell, dated 1687, which, in 1845, was removed to Great Carter-lane.

This new street line will also pass Addle Addle hill, where stood the palace of Edward the Confessor, "Ad Aedilem," and, during the widening of Upper Thames-street is a portion of the plan, in which the excavations should be closely watched; for in this line from Queen Elizabeth's Wardrobe to the Steelyard portions of the old river wall mentioned by Pitzstephen.

The new street will also pass close to the Times' printing-office beneath which is a fragment of the Roman wall and a Norman or Early English gateway or junction; and Printing-house Square, probably of the Blackfriars' Monastery. In the site lying between East-street, Blackfriars, and Skinner-street, where the proposed stations are to be constructed, much may be expected for—a portion of the Roman remains of great interest have been found on Ludgate-hill. We can add to these, the Roman pavement, and other Roman remains in the Old Goldsmith dwelling; for the poet's house was taken down some forty years ago.

The Thames Embankment Commission "Report" recommends the widening of the ancient thoroughfare of King-street, Westminster, which, by-the-by, was the scene of the execution of Guy Fawkes, now causes overcrowding in Parliament-street. It is, therefore, proposed to set back the houses on the north side of Parliament-street between Great George-street and Charles-street; and, beyond that point, to the Abbey, on the south side. The Commissioners propose that offices to the line suggested, and to take off the north end of the block of buildings between Parliament-street and King-street, as shown on the plan. The Metropolitan Board of Works consider that the latter street will thus be disturbed, and the line from Charles-street should be carried back to the line of Great George-street, and that the historical associations which will thus be broken up.

It is said that when King Charles I. was put to death once the principal street of the city of Westminster; yet such it was. In the reign of Henry VIII. it had gardens or meadow-land on the east side reaching from the Sanctuary to the Abbey, and on the west side to the site of High Gate of Richard II. at the southern extremity. This was the principal road for the royal coronation, when the Mayor went to Parliament, and faggots were usually thrown into the rute to prevent the passage. At the coronation of Mary, Machin tells us, "divers people were smothered and crushed to death" pressing in this narrow street, to see Queen Elizabeth and her nobility riding to Parliament. The Commissioners recommend that the "Hall of a great stop of coaches" occurring, a draysman and Lord Chesterfield's gentleman were killed in a fight for precedence. Nearly a century and three quarters ago it was proposed to rebuild the street, and Sir Christopher Wren, "the Magnus of Normandy that," drew and had a design to buy all King-street, and build it nobly," and that this might have been done for £50,000. However, the old place remained to be destroyed by fire, and rebuilt, and finally to be widened in street. About a century since Hatton, in 1708, described King-street as "a place most populous, and the principal thoroughfare to Westminster." Within half a century of the above relief of the traffic the houses were rebuilt on the site of the old Hall of Justice, and that of Dudley, the second Lord North, about 1646, and that was the only brick house in the street for many years.

Among the houses which were the abodes of the poet Spencer, Sackville Lord Buckhurst, the Earl of Dorset, and Carew.

On the north side of King-street, Westminster, stood, as we find the precise situation of which is thus preserved in a MS. communicated by Sir Frederick Madden to Mr. Halliwell, "the Rose Tavern." Shortly before the great trial, in 1688, between the parish of St. Margaret and the Westminster boys, a jury-garden a very rigid examination of the old parochial register took place, and the Rev. Mr. Bloomfield Oliver with as much credulity as the Rose is King-street, which was ascertained to be one of the houses on the north side of that street, and consequently to be one of those "lying between the north side of the gateway entrance to Rose Rose's Head, and the Rose Tavern," and that the Rose's Head, and the Rose Tavern, were two distinct houses originally been one. These tenements, as well as the Rose Rose's Head, were destroyed by the fire of 1834, and on the site of the latter a public-house yard, behind, for a distance of about two or three hundred feet from King-street Rose Tavern, has been erected, called "The Queen's Arms (late the Rose's Head, as rebuilt about 1710, is now (1830) standing.—George H. Mallows.

It was at this house that, in July, 1649, Cromwell, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, "in the Rose Tavern, in King-street, Westminster, by Bristol;" he went forth in "a coach with six gallant Flanders' mares, and six attendants on horseback, and a troop of horse-guards of the army; his life-guard consisting of eighty gallant men, the meanest gentleman of which was clothed in buff coats, and all gentlemen serving almost to the shaking of Charing-cross, had it been now standing in that town taken down two years." And in the Cole MSS. in the British Museum is a copy of a bill of fare of the Rose Tavern, Dunbar, Sept. 4, 1650, addressed to her in this street. In a house in this street lived Dr. Radcliffe, the celebrated Jacobite physician. Upon the west side, too, is Gardener's-lane, described, in 1708, as "a place inhabited by persons of the Romish communion," and Peter Hall, the regraver, died here in 1677, while an executioner was also here. Further down the street, near the south end, was Theving-lane "so called for that the sanctuary men used to go to the Gate House, while the Sanctuary continued to be in force."

The Report of the Royal Commissioners on Westminster recommend that the houses in Poet's corner, Old Palace yard, and Parliament-street, with the Jewel Tower, the cloisters, Chapter-house, Chapter House, Henry the Seventh's Chapel, and the south front of the Abbey, "should be gradually fully into view; the residences which stand between the Chapter House and the great west door should likewise to be removed. Thus will be opened to view the Chapter House, and the whole of the south side of the nave, which is now much obscured by the houses in Poet's corner, Old Palace yard, and Parliament-street, and the whole of the south front, including the Chapter House, Henry the Seventh's Chapel, and the south front of the Abbey, will be seen

"CATHERINE GLOVER AND THE GLEE MAIDEN ATTEMPTING TO SUCCOUR THE IMPRISONED DUKE OF ROTHSAY" ("FAIR MAID OF PERTH"), PAINTED BY MISS EDWARDS, IN THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

"CATHERINE GLOVER AND THE GLEE MAIDEN."

In our notice of the exhibition of the Society of British Artists we gave our meed of well-deserved praise to the pleasant little picture now engraved, the work of a young lady—Miss Edwards.

The subject of the picture is taken from Scott's "Fair Maid of Perth;" but we suspect that some of our readers, whose novel-reading days are, like our own, retiring into the dim past, may have a rather hazy recollection of the incident represented. To enable such as these to better understand the picture, we have taken the novel from its shelf, blown off its dust, and extracted from its pages the following interpretation of the picture engraved:—

In a city noted from time immemorial for its pretty women Catherine Glover—taking her surname from her father's trade—in the reign of Robert III. of Scotland was universally acknowledged to be the most beautiful. The fame of the "Fair Maid of Perth" drew upon her much notice from the young gallants of the Royal Court (which at that time was held near Perth), and especially that of David Rothesy, Prince of Scotland. This son of and heir to the throne of Robert III. was a dissolute but generous-hearted and unfortunate Prince. Much of his reckless dissipation is created by the fact that, after having been actually contracted to Elizabeth Dunbar, daughter of the Earl of March, to whom he was tenderly attached, he was compelled, in consequence of the powerful Earl of Douglas, or the "Black Douglas," as he was called, having offered a larger dower with his daughter Margery, to break off his contract and wed a woman he could not love.

The "Glee Maiden," a dark-complexioned, often melancholy, wandering troubadour minstrel, from Provence, the companion of Catherine in the hopeless attempt to succour the doomed Prince, belonged to a class of women very numerous in that age. Although, from the precarious life they led, their character was not always considered above suspicion, they rarely met with insult, even from the most lawless, but were protected by the chivalrous manners of the time in honour of their "Gay or Joyeuse Science." "For," says Scott, "the love of song, like the love of fight, was a common passion of the age, which all at least affected."

Now we must recall how the Duke of Rothesy came to be imprisoned. We find, then, that on quitting the lodgings of the Earl of Errol, Lord High Constable of Scotland, into whose custody, by order of the King, he had been placed for a supposed offence, the Prince went in a boat to Falkland, the residence of his wife, the Duchess, under whose protection Catherine Glover was going to place herself, both she and her father being at the time accused of heresy. The Prince took this step by the advice of the traitorous Sir John Ramorny, his late tutor and boon companion, soon to be his cowardly murderer, and to whom, feeling lonely, he had written after having dismissed him from his service, in compliance with the desire of his Royal father. The Prince was informed by Ramorny that the Duchess had just left, and that Catherine was coming to Falkland; and thereupon he determined to receive the "Fair Maid" in his wife's stead. On their way to Falkland, he and Ramorny had met the Glee Maiden, in whom the Prince had previously felt interested, and whom they brought with them. At the meeting of the Prince and Catherine the best feelings of the former were aroused by the noble resistance of Catherine to his lawless desires, and her appeals to his honour as the heir of the heroic Bruce, and to his princely knighthood. Shortly after the unhappy Prince was dragged by his revengeful false friend and thrown into the deepest dungeon of his own castle, it being given out that he was taken ill of an infectious disorder. The serving-women had been sent from the castle, but Catherine and the Glee Maiden were detained prisoners. Thrown on each other's society, these two became companions and almost friends. It was on the sixth day of their detention that the Glee Maiden, having been abroad in search of a few early flowers for Catherine, returned with the horrible intelligence that the Duke of Rothesy was being starved to death. Her little French dog, who had thrust himself into a thicket of holly bushes and yew that grew out of some old ruins close to the castle wall, came back whining and howling. Grasping for sand to discover the cause, she had heard a moaning as of one in extreme pain, had so faint that it seemed to rise from the very depth of the earth. Discovering that the sound proceeded from a small rent in the wall, she had placed her ear to the opening, and heard in the Prince's voice the words "It cannot now last long." On asking if she could help him, he had cried "Food, food; I die of famine." Womanlike, Catherine and the Glee Maiden instantly determined to succour the man who had lightly treated the one and intended to dishonour the other. Taking the small cruize which contained their soup, and the meal of which it is made, with the few cakes they had baked and some milk, they hastened to the garden, very much, no doubt, as Miss Edwards represents, and, if anything, more earnestly. Of the little success which attended their efforts, of Catherine's subsequent discovery, of the sudden return of Black Douglas, and of the hanging of the traitorous murderer Ramorny, is it not all written in ye Scottische romaunt yclept "Ye Faire Mayde of Perthe"?

FINE ARTS.

SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

The exhibition just opened in Pall-mall East is of high average excellence, more so, perhaps, than is at once apparent. Although, in trying to recall our impressions, the mind lights on few works pinnacled, as to speak, high above the rest by decidedly superior merit, we find an unusual number of niches in our memory exceedingly well filled. The high level always maintained at the gallery of this society is especially remarkable this year, for nearly every contributor is seen at his best.

A few artists have, however, not only surpassed themselves, but are conspicuous by the relative importance of their contributions. Foremost amongst these we must place Mr. Carl Haag. In his large and elaborate drawing of "Palmyra" (186) Mr. Haag has given us a work of unusually high technical merit, and one the subject of which affords a very rare and peculiar interest. It is, we believe, a century since any illustrations of the magnificent ruins of Palmyra were submitted to the public, and afterwards published in this country by an Englishman—and we presume Mr. Haag is now to be considered as naturalised amongst us, seeing that he has he entered the "Artist's Volunteer Corps," and is a most exemplary "private" therein. The illustrations to which we refer were the plates published in Wood and Dawkins's "Description of Palmyra," folio, London, 1758. Mr. David Roberts, when at Baalbek, included it is said, to have pushed on to Palmyra, but was compelled by fever to beat a precipitate retreat to the coast. A journey to Palmyra is attended with much difficulty and expense, and not altogether free from danger—of robbery, if nothing worse, from the wandering Arabs. The circumstances which led to Mr. Haag's visit to Palmyra are narrated in Miss Emily Beaufort's clever book, "Egyptian Sepulchres and Syrian Shrines." When at Damascus Mr. Haag joined the caravan consisting of an English party, of which Miss Beaufort was a member, and the journey was accomplished under the escort of Sheikh Mignal, the remarkable Bedouin chief whose portrait we engraved after a study by Mr. Haag, in the Winter Exhibition at the gallery. Mr. Haag's noble picture is worthy of such a subject, for extent, the ruins of those ancient cities dwindle into insignificance before the glorious remains of the "Queen of the Desert," the Tadmor in the wilderness, built or made to be a resting-place for us by Solomon, and afterwards the Palmyra of Zenobia and the Romans. The temple of the Sun, the Corinthian colonnade, and other ruins—all comprised in this drawing—extend nearly a mile and a half. Still we see the dark, plumed palms, which give the city its name and Valley of Tadmor and Hinnom, growing beside the white columns. We may remark, however, that, imposing as is the city from the distant point of sight chosen by the artist, there is little to enjoy a nearer view. Few of the remains are remarkable for beauty, and those of great excellence are much ruined.

In some earlier works by this artist we have remarked the tendency to exaggeration of colour and effect characteristic of the "early, earnest, but crude" style of art; but for choice this drawing with anything of the kind. The intense and poetical sunset glow suffusing the whole middle distance, and deepening into almost midnight gloom among the far-off hills, may seem strange and melodramatic to our unsentimental eyes; but from all we can learn, this is the hue in which we must be true to the facts. It is, indeed, we suspect, within the truth. At all events, it is nearer the truth than the cold grey of the ordinary sunset of the desert than the much more violent colouring of Mr. Holman Hunt. One thing is quite certain—namely, that the drawing is a remarkable illustration of the most perfect art, where colours, and still more remarkable on account of its subject. Mr. Haag has also a small but interesting work (No. 220), "Bedouin at Baalbek" (69).

The most exquisite figure-painting in the room, and, we think, surpassing in loveliness everything the artist has previously exhibited, is No. 239, by Mr. Burton. It is simply a study of a young and beautiful girl, dressed in white muslin, lying idly on a couch. The rich golden auburn hair scattered over the green figured velvet cushion, the head and eyes turned towards a spray of white lilies, and the fair white hand—a drawing more remarkable for ornate yet chaste elegance, and for tender pearliness of colour, and for delicacy of drawing and modelling, we do not remember to have seen. This is one of a series from each member of the society, to be presented in an album to Mr. R. Neal. The gentlemen belong to the "Old Water-Mill Club," and in acknowledgment of his services in that capacity, especially in the management of the recent grand concert in aid of its funds. The members of the society have agreed to present him with a drawing. Returning to Mr. Burton, we have to notice a drawing of "A Norman Girl Sailing Glass" (234), which, though not a painting of the refinement of his first-named contribution, is nevertheless very charming; and a striking life-size female head, of the Venetian order of beauty, entitled "Inspiration" (273), which has force and considerable expression, but is chiefly noticeable for the energy of the execution and freedom on the scale of nature.

Another artist who has distinguished himself in an unusual degree is Mr. Arnald Read, who shows in the principal result of a recent visit to Spain, a large and impressive drawing of the interior of "The Cathedral of Seville" (57)—decidedly the most important work he has hitherto exhibited. Among the many pictures of Spanish life and the exterior of celebrated Moorish buildings, we have met with nowhere else so very nearly a painter has attempted to depict the grand and solemn interiors of the cathedrals of Seville and Toledo. From unfamiliarity with the subject, and from the fine but dark transparent brown, the visitor may suspect that Mr. Read has exaggerated the obscurity of "dim religious light" in which the building is rendered; still more soothe by the profusion of stained glass—and the effects of which the artist has so well appreciated and rendered—but we have, however, remember that, when one passes from the blinding sunlight into some of the gloomy Spanish churches, it is impossible before the eye can distinguish the various objects or run the mysterious darkness. As we are engraving this very interesting as well as striking drawing, we shall have a better opportunity of noticing it.

Mr. J. Gilbert sustains his well-known reputation for telling a story, whether comic or serious, for humour, pathos, or sentiment, in an extraordinary facility, in "Don Quixote's Curious Discourse upon Arms and Letters" (18), and the scene from "Twelfth Night," "Malvolio vather gives acquaintance" (20). Every time that we see Mr. Gilbert's work one cannot help (even if theoretical objections are entertained) heartily yielding ourselves captivated by his marvellously dashing and spirited handling. Conventional, even mechanical, it may be considered, but Mr. Gilbert is master of a style, and this is a very rare accomplishment amongst English painters. Rubens himself was hardly a more determined stylist. This "style" or chique, as some may be disposed to call it, may be seen in the inimitable way in which he will paint a broken stone bottle or a pewter pitcher (see the latter named drawing), and in the touch of the big beads. While we would be the last to wish to see the artist's slave to his material, there are, we sometimes think, occasions when he is able to cash particular medium employed; and we find that while Mr. Gilbert brings from his practice in oil new mechanical power, through the embodiment of the same with the transparent colours, he still in the present work gives too much of the effect that is more suitable in a re-ved experiment, from, apparently, a too free use of reed pen.

Mr. Alfred Fripp has two careful and delicately finished drawings: one of a boy with guns (254), the other of a party of sailor and fisher boys (the bankrupt group—the latter all carrying kicking up his heels); ally watching a shoal of porpoises out at sea and laughing at their clumsy, tumbling gambols.

By Mr. George Fripp, the brother of the last-named painter, there are several meritorious landscapes, of which the most important is the large view of the Welsh town of Usk, on the Newport and Pontypool road from Basgor to Capel Clirig, near the Penhpra slate quarries, with the mountains Carnedh David, and Llewellyn. There is much quiet truth in all this artist's works, but this and most others are chargeable with a certain monotonous dullness of effect and a sort of blotting-paper texture.

Mr. Walter Goodall has made a notable advance in "Le Rehquaire" (149), a remarkable monk showing a sacred relic contained in a box flung from his neck to a couple of pretty Brittany girls. We are engraving this pleasant and well-painted work. "The Winter's Evening" (129), a child and cat asleep by the fireside is another, very creditable drawing by Mr. W. Goodall. His brother, Mr. Edward Goodall, has made an equally great stride—observable in the delicacy of his whole treatment and the tenderness of his various and pleasing colour. Take for confirmation his "Naples, from the Villa Reale" (58), and his "Caffe Militari, Lago Maggiore" (64). Mr. Topham contributes but two drawings, and these contain only one or two figures. They are "A Flower Girl" (300), and "An Irish Girl Screening her Little Sister from the Storm"—a charming example (302). Mr. Bennett has carefully painted and minutely finished drawing of a ball-stripped boy shivering timidly at the edge of a stream, entitled "Only Paddling" (309), and another, a study of "Farfalina" (350), a girl playing with butterflies, herself gayer than a butterfly, a most beautiful piece of colour, and of the most delicate touch in the use of feathers. Of Mr. Oakley's works we much prefer his rustic "Molecatcher" (179) to his drawing-room subjects. Mr. Burgess contributes several clever drawings from Irish subjects by Mr. Rivière, and two or three pleasing drawings from Brittany subjects by Mr. Jenkins. Mr. Lee has selected the principal figure-subjects, as well as some remarkable works in other departments.

The life-sized artist has, however, won his chief success in landscape this year, especially in his "Clearing Up" (157), in which there is a gathering tumult in the atmosphere, with the sun struggling out of threatening masses of autumn storm-cloud, leaving rents, opening up the blue and pure sky, and gaze, through which the storm-gloom is the hurrying rearers, and the cool, glassy canal, and lights up the rainbow that smiles below the retiring tempest. Another of Mr. Lee's pictures of the mass of landscapes we must, however, allude to the works of Messrs. William Hunt, Frederick Taylor, the president, Mr. Richardson, and Mr. Gilbert, jun. Mr. William Hunt's still-life is more and more wonderful, and for this reason, because, while equally remarkable as examples of pictorial realism, his works yearly acquire more of that largeness and certainty of touch which distinguishes matured power. Mr. Hunt's works nevertheless deserves the most careful study, and we cannot refrain from particularising as striking instances of this masterly freedom, as well as of his powers of colour, the drawings of "Fruit and the Old Stone Plums, &c." (288); "A Bird's Nest" (277), with the soft down which forms the lining of the fragile nest contrasting with exquisite truth; and the "Roses, &c." (271), in which the blue stains of the pattern within the enamel of the Indian jar are quite marvellously true.

We may be fastidious, but, with all its merit as a drawing, the subject of Mr. Taylor's "Gossips" (146), which, we think, has been brought down on the Skirts of the Village" (140), repels our interest. Hawkins, as usual, is very clever in his "Portrait Group," a thing of the past. In the "Woodland Scene, with Dogs and Game" (78), Mr. Taylor is more at home, and, although the dogs are not what which has been driven on to the treacherous sands by the tempest still signing, he has produced a work of considerable merit. In the mists slanting low towards the horizon, the waves sweeping clean over the submerged hull. The partial light that gleams between figures still clinging to the crosstrees, yards, and shrouds, some trying to reach the boat that has come to their rescue, like a small but powerful steam-tug and others dreading to give up their hold for a moment, fearful of meeting the fate of the rest, are finely contrasted with the calm of the wide broad among the screaming gulls and petrels.

Nearly all the older landscape members are well represented. Mr. Richardson's "Lake of Geneva" (7), "A Scene near the Font du Caille, between Chambery and Annecy" (37), and a view of "The Wellhouse, Leatherhead" (39), are, perhaps, the most remarkable. Originality of these is not likely to suit the growing public taste for literal truth; but they are poetical and true to the impression, that painter, like Mr. Gilbert, is master of a style, and that a beautiful one. Mr. Richardson's works are always recognisable by a forced warmth in the atmospheric effects, and by a love of overdoing colour. Of their skilful manipulation and artistic beauty there can, nevertheless, be no doubt. As however, we have remarked on previous occasions, the Richardson scene is tempted to inquire how it happens they are so much alike. The lovely little "Lake Scene" (39), near Leatherhead, and that view of "The Environs of Gergent, Sicily" (214), with its unusually harmonious tone, are like the reality, one cannot help thinking that the Lake of Geneva and Sicily, for the splendour of the Alps, and the Lavernese-shire (?), would be less like them. Mr. Richardson's real deep sea certainly not like any sea we have ever seen. Impressions and the representations of other artists convince us that the aspect of the Highlands is more subdued and grey, even when the sun is at its zenith than usual, and his rare gift as a colourist shines out in full force in the low-toned richness of his "Fields" (94), and his "Stanchell Farm, Sussex" (95), and in the "Sunset on the Coast of S. S. Giovanni Paolo, Venice" (135), with its sumptuous gilt ceiling and splitting light. Messrs. Fahey, Fitzgerald, and Vacher, Bentley, and Smith's "Sunset on the Grand Canal, Venice" (100), is a striking work, and one which will account for the splendour of the sunset at Venice. Inverness-shire (?), would be less like them. Mr. Richardson's sad deep sea certainly not like any sea we have ever seen. Impressions and the representations of other artists convince us that the aspect of the Highlands is more subdued and grey, even when the sun is at its zenith than usual, and his rare gift as a colourist shines out in full force in the low-toned richness of his "Fields" (94), and his "Stanchell Farm, Sussex" (95), and in the "Sunset on the Coast of S. S. Giovanni Paolo, Venice" (135), with its sumptuous gilt ceiling and splitting light. Messrs. Fahey, Fitzgerald, and Vacher, Bentley, and Smith's "Sunset on the Grand Canal, Venice" (100), is a striking work, and one which will account for the splendour of the sunset at Venice. Mr. Richardson's "Treute, in the Tyrol" (149), we shall engrave. In some smaller drawings—particularly No. 193 and "The Thames at Rotherhithe, from the Surrey Side" (195)—there is a quaint truthfulness which are more delightful than anything we have previously observed in the works of Mr. Fahey. We must also notice the finished drawing of a "Fruit Wharf on the Shore of the Golden Horn, Stamboul" (196), which is no joke to look at, and the extreme brilliancy (and often fallacious) effect of climate to his work, yet it has the stamp of honesty and truth. Mr. Branwhite's winter sunsets and moonlights are taken, as they ought to be, from the more subdued and reflective character of this artist's works is best discovered in his representations of sea-coast views at Whitby and Filey Brigg, in Yorkshire, and in the neighbourhood of Hastings. They are fresh and refreshing truth, and very soundly painted. We shall engrave his view of "Staithes, Yorkshire" (172). Mr. Naftel, who should be a Scotch artist, has a number of drawings, including "The Caves at Guernsey, of "Capachio, in the Bay of Salerno" (211), and other of the Italian coast, which are very pleasing examples of delicate grey colour, which have always, to some extent, injured his works. Mr. D. Cox, jun., has a fine Carnarvonshire drawing, and Mr. Leitch, the painter, we think, for not attempting too closely to tread in the steps of his eminent father. Mr. Dodgson exhibits a beautiful little work entitled "Sunset on the Coast of Normandy" (227), and Read paying in glints through the lower branches of some stately trees in "The Avenue, Bushey Park" (228), and a charming view of "Whitby Abbey" (246). Few will be insensible to the peculiar suggestiveness of Mr. Jutsum's "Ruined Chapel, indefinite execution in such a subject as "Winter Evening" (265).

Mr. Birkett Foster's execution has much less than heretofore of the neatness of touch which, though always pleasing, is unlike—found in the engraver's art, but it does not yet rise into what we have learned entitle "style." Mr. Foster is a genuine lover of our English rustic landscape, and has a fine sense of the picturesque; but, unless we are much mistaken, the more the artist is true to nature, it should for this reason be the less concealed that the extreme prettiness, which in their most salient characteristic, is not the noblest attribute of art. The artist's drawings are, in fact, pictorial, and, in this shine—a source of interest and beauty too often neglected. In "The Pool" (164), "The Mill" (165), and "Spring" (166), the topographical phenomena of each stratum of the atmosphere—the lofty and fleecy cirrus, the lower cirro-cumulus, the ponderous cumulus, and the mists from the earth—discriminated with admirable delicacy and feeling. Mr. W. Callow has several of his broadly and freely handled architectural subjects, and a view of the falls of Rhine at Schaffhausen (45), which seems to dwarf the great cataract into a rather pretty waterfall. Another pure architectural water-painter is Mr. J. Callow is represented, as usual, by marine subjects; the late Mr. Cox, by a couple of his usual compositions, and Mr. Duncan by sunny Italian views; Mr. Burgess by French street-scenes; and Mr. Gastineau by a drawing in his usual style. Two drawings by Mr. Rosenburg of "A Norwegian Fjord" (161) and "Summer Snow" (164) have the look of being extremely faithful to the cold colour and pallid aspect of nature in these high latitudes. The first represents a calm summer night, and the rays of the unsetting sun flush with a lovely rosate tint the cones of the hills surrounding the still and glassy lake beneath.

We owe an apology to Mr. Davidson for not having mentioned before this that he has a number of drawings scattered about the room which deserve the warmest encomiums for their close and truthful study of nature. The remarks must be the old one of the cabarets de richesse. Perhaps Mr. Davidson is seen to most advantage in the large drawing of a bamboo and a Cochin-China in very early spring (111). In some other drawings of harvest-fields, &c., the negative colour of February is not so suitable. This remark hardly applies to "Rokeby" (102), a large and if it did, the excellent rendering of the grand swelling masses of thunder-cloud would more than atone. We have also many fine recent pictures by Cattermole, Messrs. A. W. Hunt, Newton, Whittaker, and Willis.

Mr. Alfred Hunt is, we believe, the youngest among those who, seeing some cruelty of colour and photographic hardness in his works, will at once set them down as possessing the magical qualities of a something in which Ruskin is to be found. The principle on which they style pre-Raphaelism. On the other hand, many unsophistic persons will from the same cause, not do them justice. Mr. Hunt's most ambitious drawing, "Rokeby" (102), is a startling attempt to paint the effect of the bright sunlight shining on the water-lilies in a dazzling cheaper of pale yellow light and purple shadow on a peat-stained stream struggling and seething among the jagged cloven rocks and the scattered boulders of its rapid mountain channel. The colour oppositions are here too violent: they may, notwithstanding, exist, they must—that much of the truth of nature, but they give pain rather than pleasure, because the restrictions of art relative to nature are not observed. In other drawings we are as catholic an appreciation, he will, we think, find that this drawing, extremely clever as it undoubtedly is, affords no exception to the great rule, that "it is not all gold that glitters." In art it is everything to smaller works by this artist, we find that another view about Rokeby—"Mortham Tower" (103), the "Barnard Castle" (230) and the "St. Gothard" (32), have really marvellous delicacy and passages of beauty in the foliage and trees. The latter "Sabine Hills" (161), again, with the unnatural hues of its exceptional precision, is almost wholly unpleasant; and "A Gnarled Beech Tree" (30) contributes nothing to aerial perspective so common in photography. It is, indeed, difficult to believe that in the latter drawing the artist has studied photographs with such care as nature; and he has paid the penalty for the mistake. Mr. Newton contributes some very pleasing studies of the immediate neighbourhood "Pass of Glencoe;" but he has several drawings of great impressiveness, including, however, in more than one instance, to exaggeration. Two of these represent the interior of Tintern Abbey, Venice (51) with the church and the neighbouring buildings fused, as it were, into one mass of deep shadow, the figures in front just after sunset, the other with a sunnier union effected by the silvery, silken veil of moonlight, and in which the ruined arches and the tall grass are touched into the shimmering welter and flashing fringe of the moon's reflection on the rippling surface of its silent way. Mr. Newton makes too much of his artistic gift when he thus chooses the aspect and glancing of the distant masts. A weird and strangely impressive drawing is "The Ruins of Glastonbury" (52), with inappropriate title, from Byron, "Bone and her ruin past redemption's skill." It represents the Roman Tower (the Tower of Melancholy, and not the Arch of Constantine) at night, with the faint moonlight held in suspension as it were in the chill mist, which looks, one might fancy, more drear and ghostly from its contrast with the figure in the more poetical mood, from its resembling the heavy veil thrown by Time over the monuments of Rome's greatest glory. Mr. Willis is well represented in several drawings, admirable for their excellent painting of labouring, or drowsy and ruminating cattle, and for their truth to the pastoral feeling. Last, but not least, Mr. Whittaker shows, in his faithful rendering of the true severity and unconventional harshness of Welsh mountain and mountain pass, a most unusual appreciation of the impressive appropriateness which have much affinity with the noble art of David Cox.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

(SECOND AND CONCLUDING NOTICE.)

HAVING reviewed the figure-pictures in oil in our former article, it remains to notice the landscapes, sea-pieces, water-colour drawings, &c. As in the previous notice, from which we omitted certain unfortunate pictures, we consider it within the limits of our duty to offer any remarks upon some landscapes here merely because the hangers have placed them in very good positions, and because the merit of any kind we shall, however, be most anxious to recognise wherever we find it.

Mr. George Cole seems to have been incited, possibly by the deserved success of his son, Mr. Vicat Cole, to attempt a new class of effect, out of the ordinary line of his usual pastoral subjects. His drawing of Storm in Autumn—"The Last Loud" (31)—one of the finest landscapes in these rooms. The storm is over the wide moor land, and sweeps hurry to the "harvest home" before the masses of lurid, purple, cloud—edged by the declining sun with crimson, and gold, and orange, and green, and all the hues of the rainbow, but the sudden thunderstorm of autumn. The sky is very boldly and effectively painted; the effect of the whole and the subordinate landscape admirably rendered The picture, without being at all imitative of any particular style, is in the general style of Mr. Danniel's landscapes of pastoral subjects. Mr. Cole's remaining contributions are in his usual style, and of these the most important is "Dairy Farm, Surrey" (67). Mr. Vicat Cole's "Sunset" (66) we need hardly say, well painted; and the colour is various and beautiful, though there is a certain monotony in the whole of the drawing. Mr. Vicat Cole has no large work, but three rather small pictures fully support his reputation. "The Sea-Shore" (68) is one of the most beautiful scenes in Surrey—the foreground tapestried with heather, gorse, ferns, and wild-flowers; a hillock crested with picturesque pines, and the sea, with a sunset effect, lighting a small, greycloaded sky, and an intermediate reach of weald country. No. 250 is one of this painter's most successful productions. The colour is very true to nature, especially in the wavelike effect of the wind on the corn; but perhaps a little more delicacy of touch would not be lost upon the landscape recently introduced. Mr. Vicat Cole's third work is a very powerful study of a beech copse (856).

Mr Syer is a very pleasing artist in colour, and, as we should say, a genuine relish for certain accidents of cloud, wind, and colour, which not much more nature would have to be introduced. Three of his pictures here are of comparative importance, but they are certainly not his best. "Sunset on the Coast" (41) is a showy effect of colour, and light and shade out of every square inch of his canvas. The eye consequently knows not where to rest, and in vain the mind seeks for repose. "Sunset on the Downs" (42) is somewhat quieter and chiller; and when we resolutely analyse any particular square inch of the picture we are not certain that the effect is untrue to nature. The same remark applies to the "Tynemouth" (133), and the "St. Michael's Mount" (134). Mr. Syer's best work is "A Cottage on the Lledr, Wales" (179). We must in justice add, that Mr. Syer's pictures afforded more evidence of study "on the spot," and were in better condition than most among our English exhibitors. Mr. H. Boddington is another unquestionably gifted painter who, from some peculiarity of eye, or some mistaken principle, is certainly easy to believe that "The Close of an Autumnal Day, North Wales" (165), was painted from nature. We have seen many skies like that which was studied directly from nature. It is painful how frequently in these rooms this nature-at-third-hand look is found. Anywhere in the Continent, and, we fear, in this, and on the Continent, receive that thorough artistic education from masters which might give them a "style" that, to a limited extent, would compensate for these reproductions and repetitions. In "The old Moat-house—Evening" (422), another of Mr. Boddington's pictures, we have the well-known effect of the horizontal ray of the setting sun striking the tops of trees; but we will not quarrel with an effect so delicately represented, especially as it is this time given with new scenery—scenery, too, emacking of honest outdoor work. The foreground is very true to nature. The sky is filled with "yellow lilies," its drowsily-nodding rushes and solitary bittern, the quiet evening hour and the old hideaway ruin, combine to give a perfect sentiment of loneliness to this pleasing picture. Far more satisfactory that the first-named work is also a View "On the River Neckr" (570) by the same artist.

Mr. S. R. Percy is another painter who has not fully redeemed the great promise of his early works, and from apparently the same causes which have restricted Mr. Boddington's art. Mr. Percy having acquired a command of certain sources of strong effect, obtained usually by violent contrast and intensity of colour, seems to rest satisfied with repeating that charm. At all events, this conclusion is suggested by his "Welsh Pasture View" (602). "The Valley of the Lledr, North Wales" (209), represents the scene under favourable conditions of burning sunset colour. This picture is an unusually fresh and impressive example. Still there is a tendency to exaggeration. Not, certainly, in the cyrophanic and ugly sense of the phrase—for no pigments can approach its blinding intensity; nor in the strong purples of the distant hills, for the eye would assist us in supplying those complementary colours—but in the opposition of cold brilliant greens, unaffected by the glow which must suffuse the whole atmosphere. Mr. Tennant is confirmed in a system of painting which is not so common in the indistinctness of his "well-fish" aerial distances (see 668), as in the heavy for-ground of "Penmaenmawr" (1), which makes all trees of the same species in the "Scene in Peterborough" (212). Mr. A. Gilbert has a truthfully-painted effect of gloomy "Morning Mist clearing off" (313), but there is too little "material" in the picture handed down to posterity. Mr. Hulme's "Morning on the coast (see 86), one of many similar, has the slight appearance of a work executed from very hasty sketches, if not "composed." But perhaps the easiest painting in these rooms is to be obtained from Mr. G. A. Williams's receipt for a snow piece. When once, however, the painter can make up his mind to paint a large picture, cover it with like variegated marbles, and so on, till he gets the colours of the opal or the mackerel, there will be not much difficulty in producing a work which might be placed side by side with some of Mr. Fyee's pretty unrealities. We must, however, call attention to a work of comparatively exceptional force and verisimilitude, in which whose love for chromatic harmonies unruly loads him to sacrifice so much truth to nature. We allude to Mr. Lee's "Sunset on the Venice" (37). Mr. J. F. Pettitt's "Morning" (176) is mentioned in its right landed; texture, and quality, especially of water. Mr. Shayer's boat picture (240) does not escape an always recognisable heaviness of tone.

We now resume the more agreeable part of our duty by turning to a group of artists whose works may be more unreservedly commended. Prominent among these is Mr. Hulme's view, "On the Thames, Surrey" (300), which is conscientious, and has much quiet truth to the prevailing character of English landscape. Very much praise is due to Mr. Gosling's "Summer on the Thames" (202). Though very similar in some pressing works, Mr. Gosling preserves a certain freshness, and makes us feel that we either do or can enjoy nature in locality represented. It is true the artist does not give any unusual and often complicated meteorological phenomena, but he proves to a very limited extent upon the resources of his palette, confining himself, apparently, to some half-dozen colours, and producing a pleasant painting two obvious; yet his works have an aspect of open-air daylight, and are otherwise good, as far as they go—which is saying a great deal. "Langham Castle, Carmarthenshire" (600), by Mr. Ashby, is a very powerful sketch; but it cannot be considered more than a sketch. "A Pass Mountain Valley" (42), by Mr. Leader, though not a very interesting view, and by no means a favourable example, is painted with all the love of the long-loving and meritorious painter. Mr. Peel's "Guisbro' Abbey, Yorkshire" (116), though of recent pretensions as a work, has a carefully-painted foreground. A view of the sea from a distance, "Off the Nore" (87), by Mr. Morris, entitled "Lights of the Ocean, Sea Proscriptions" (672), renders a strikingly-beautiful appearance of the sea, together with an imposing effect of moonlight among masses of cumuli cloudy, though rarely seen in nature, and not to be recommended by experience of the same in the Mediterranean) are very artistically observed and truthfully executed. The marine pieces by Mr. E. Hayes, especially a sweet little picture in a "Scene on the Coast of Kent" (205), in which—as far as we can see—the sea is not placed in the "south-west" room—we may excuse the apparent imitation of Stanfield, since it has caught so much of the excellence of that master; and a small picture in next room, the floor in the same room, styled "Spring Time," by Mr. Boughton, a most promising painter, whose aggregate of "Autumn," in the British Institution Exhibition, has been so generally admired, and whose "Sunday Morning" is engraved from the exhibition for the relief of Lancashire distress. This picture simply represents a plain, homely French rustic girl sprinkling seed from the fullness—the sentiment pointing, of course, to the "good time" of life and nature; but, though too brownish and loosely handled, it has a charm of considered truthfulness, and is the result of more pretentious works in these rooms. We should have included this picture, together with "Winter Evening" (see 86), the "principal study" of merit, by Mr. R. Collinson, in our former notice of the figure-subjects. We may here, with all our space, mention, as worthy of excellence of that master; and a small picture next the door

ANCIENT LAKE TERRACES ON THE NORTH SHORE OF LAKE SUPERIOR.

We here give a representation of certain ancient lake terraces on the north side of Lake Superior, near to Slate Island, and which will no doubt be found, in connection with our Engraving of the parallel roads of Glen Roy, of great interest to our readers. Phenomena analogous to the above have been observed by Dr. Hooker, in the Himalaya Mountains; but nowhere have the changes which have taken place in the relative position of land and water been more strongly evidenced and defined than here. They have only been disturbed in one or two places by the protrusion of igneous or metamorphic rocks, round which the terraces have been formed as a deposit of a similar nature might now be laid down around any isolated rock standing near a shore. As seen from the water through the clear atmosphere, and in the brilliant sunshine of a summer's afternoon on Lake Superior, these ancient terraces or beaches form a striking and a beautiful background, and would, doubtless, well repay the labours of any geologist or antiquarian who might devote a portion of his time to examining their structure and their contents.

In the foreground of the Engraving are two of the large "North canoes," commonly used by the traders and others. They are about 30 ft. long, and 5 ft. wide in the middle, and are pointed alike at each end. Although made only of the bark of the birch-tree, and with round bottoms, these canoes are able to carry fully a ton weight, and are as safe or safer, either when sailing or under the paddle, in the swell of that vast freshwater sea, as an ordinary boat of the same dimensions; and when well manned, as those represented in the Engraving are supposed to be, they frequently traverse sixty or seventy miles a day.

PRESBYTERIAN CHAPEL AT CLAPHAM.

THE new Presbyterian chapel at Clapham is built in the classical style, with a lofty and well-proportioned portico of Corinthian columns. The façade is well raised above the ground, and presents an imposing appearance. The interior has many novel features. It is oval all round, and large chambers are provided for ventilation, by means of which the temperature is kept admirably cool and equable. The columns dividing the nave from the aisles are of iron, light and graceful, and the platform is of polished oak. The chapel contains sittings for 1200 persons, and the contract was only £7000, which includes a lecture-hall to contain 400 persons, large and commodious vestries, chapel-keepers' rooms, and all the requisite accommodation.

CONSECRATION OF THE MEMORIAL BUILDING ERECTED OVER THE WELL AT CAWNPORE.

A MOST impressive ceremony took place at Cawnpore on the 11th of February last. On that day a memorial building erected over the well into which were cast the remains of a great number of Christians, chiefly women and children, massacred on the 15th of July, 1857, together with two inclosures near the memorial building, containing the graves of soldiers who died in the same year, were consecrated. The service was performed at sunset by the Bishop of Calcutta, assisted by the Ven. the Archdeacon; the Rev. T. N. Burn, Domestic Chaplain; and the Chaplain of Cawnpore. Seven other clergymen from neighbouring stations, all in surplices, were present, as also were his Excellency the Viceroy, Lady Elgin, and Lady Louisa Bruce; the Commander-in-Chief, the General of the Lucknow Division, the Chief Commissioner of Oude, and a very large number of persons from Cawnpore, Allahabad, Lucknow, Futtehpore, and other places within reach, together with about a thousand soldiers of the Queen's Bays, 46th Regiment, and the artillery. When the Bishop was about to begin his address (which he delivered from the steps of the memorial-well) the soldiers were all marched up as close as possible round him, so that a large portion of them could hear him and join in the service which followed. The native Christians of Cawnpore were also placed at a short distance from the Bishop, under the charge of Mr. Burnell, missionary. The service was the usual one for the consecration of cemeteries, with the addition of two prayers appropriate to the occasion (one being the collect for Innocents' Day) and some stanzas from Keble's hymn for St. John's Day, "Lord, and what shall this man do," sung by the choir. The memorial to the Bishop requesting the consecration was signed by the Viceroy, "in the name of the Christian subjects of her Majesty Queen Victoria." The scene was most striking, the service most solemn, and the beauty of the memorial building universally acknowledged. The design for it was given by Colonel Yule, when Public Works Secretary; but for the admirable manner in which it has been carried out the Anglo-Indian community is indebted to the taste, skill, and care of C. B. Thornhill, Esq., Commissioner of Allahabad. The monument consists of an octagonal Gothic screen on a platform which encircles the well. The well itself is vaulted over, and covered with a pedestal which awaits the statue Lord Canning promised to order, from Baron Marochetti. Round the rim of the well, and within the screen, is written, "Sacred to the perpetual memory of a great company of Christian people, chiefly women and children, who near this spot were cruelly massacred by the followers of the rebel Nana Dhoondopunt, of Bithoor; and cast, the dying with the dead, into the well below, on the 15th day of July, 1857."

NEW GALLERY OF THE INSTITUTION OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS, PALL-MALL.

WE have already informed our readers that their old friends, the whilom "New Society of Painters in Water Colours," were setting their house in order—not with any idea of being summoned to leave it, but because they had a new one, and were going to begin life afresh, and with a new name. Without, we believe, consulting Lord Llanover, with no letters patent, and no authorisation of the Heralds' College, the "New Society" has boldly assumed the title, and claims to be henceforth known by "all whom it may concern" as the "Institute of Painters in Water Colours." The reasons for the change of name are explained in the following words prefixed to the catalogue of this year's exhibition:—"When, upwards of thirty years since, a second exhibition of water-colour painters was established, the name of 'The New Society of Painters in Water Colours' seemed the most appropriate designation which the society could bear. The word 'new' is now an anomaly. The society has attained a maturity which justifies its assuming a more appropriate title, and the opening of its recently-purchased and newly-built gallery has been deemed an occasion on which this change of name may set once be properly adopted." The old designation, the members further argued, was always liable to misconceptions, which they wished to repudiate; some persons thinking the association a parvenu affair, others that it was a sort of sapping-shoot to the elder society. For these apparently good and sufficient reasons, and seeing also that everybody has, we are told, a right to assume whatever name he pleases, no objection can be made to the new and more ambitious designation. The position of the property, rebuilding, and enlargement of the gallery, 53, Pall-mall, were possibly considered by the recent subscribers, proprietors, and purchasers of their premises by the elder society. The institute has, however, done more. It has not only increased its gallery by carrying it from the ground to the first floor, so as to be out of the shadow from the adjoining and hitherto more lofty British Institution premises, but it has added a few more architectural pretension to the house in Pall-mall, which forms the front entrance of the gallery, and which we have engraved.

The new gallery is unpretending in its decorations; the roof is rather low, but partly for this reason it is extremely light, and the ventilation, by means of zinc lattice-work round the compartments of the skylight, is as perfect. And, although the height of the gallery at present affords sufficient space, by its length and the small room beyond, for the favourable hanging of all the contributions without the necessity of resorting to screens, which are inconvenient to visitors, especially on the always crowded private view days, and detrimental to many of the works so concealed or inhibited. All this purchasing of premises, building, enlarging, and decorating seem to grow out of the water-colour society's success, especially when we remember that the neighbouring British Institution exhibition of oil pictures is in a languishing condition, and that one exhibitor, chiefly of works in oil colours, the Portland Gallery—disappeared altogether last year. Against this, however, we have to take the success of the Water-Colour Society, for many of British Artists have also partly reconstructed their galleries; and, whatever signs of decay there may be elsewhere, there are none in the Royal Academy. On the contrary, the academy funds are in a condition to enable that body to follow, if called upon to do so, the excellent example of independence afforded by the water-colour societies.

A few retrospective notes on the history of the present institute may not be out of place on this occasion. The New Society of Painters in Water Colours originated out of Dickinson's system, upon which the senior society was founded and has always been regulated. According to the rules of the original society no one but a member is allowed to exhibit drawings in it, and as it has become a member thirty years ago was especially difficult, because they were restricted to a short list of names of amateurs of respectable practitioners, owing to the rapid increase about that period in the cultivation of the art. A numerous body therefore formed to establish a society on a more liberal plan. This was done, and the first exhibition of the "New Society" was opened with great éclat at 11, Old Bond-street, in the spring of 1834, with 120 exhibitors and 330 drawings. We may remark, en passant, that the exhibiting "members" and "associates" are now about 120 each. The first is said to have been an excellent exhibition; the visitors and the sales were numerous. But success proved to have been the bane of the new society, by encouraging the formation of the present of rival. Some of the members of inferior talent formed the project of getting the whole affair under their own control; and, as that class formed the majority, they succeeded in getting therefore all artists whose talents had established the exhibition, and who in consequence resigned. This cabal succeeded in getting all the retiring members continued to accede to the elder society (a proceeding since prevented by compelling candidates to wait a year), but at the end of two or three years, the prospects of the New Society appeared nearly ruined, till, some more sensible men, getting among them, turned out the leader of the cabal, an amateur named Mr. Massey, who had usurped the office of president, and from that time the society seems to have gone on well. It is due to the late and present authority for the version of the dispute here given to Rarsdell Taylor, author of "The Fine Arts in Great Britain," to whom has been the honorary secretary of the society, but resigned, with five others. Four exhibitions were held in Bond-street; the society then went to Exeter Hall, and in 1850 they removed to Pall-mall, and have, like the elder society, adopted the exclusive system against which it was mainly established to protect. But they have also their system of the water-colour bodies can afford any space—like the Royal Academy, and as in other exhibitions—for "outsiders," and permitted to exhibit in either of the water-colour galleries in Pall-mall, is limited to small isolated spaces in two or three pictures, according to the size his drawings are placed, as it were, on sufferance, and where they have to compete with the greater force of richness of tone, full development and the freest principles in art, as in everything else, are the best.

TESTIMONIAL TO ADAM SMITH, ESQ., C.E.

We give this week an Engraving of a beautiful testimonial which has been recently presented to Mr. Adam Smith, civil and mechanical engineer, under the late Mr. Rendel, for the new docks at Great Grimsby, and who has for many years had the chief superintendence thereof for the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, who are the proprietors. Mr. Smith having recently left Grimsby, a number of his friends decided to present him with some mutual expression of their respect and esteem. It consists of a double entrepiece, which forms either a candelabrum or a centre epergne. It represents a tree, under which are two stags beautifully modelled in frosted silver. The base is a tripod, with three polished sides, on one of which is engraved the following inscription:—"Presented to Adam Smith, Esq., C.E., by his numerous friends as an affectionate tribute of their esteem for his high character and abilities, and as a very great ability he has manifested in the carrying out of the various important public works intrusted to him. Palaeum qui vincit perficit. December, 1862." On the other two sides are engraved views of the Grimsby Docks and other public works with which Mr. Smith has been connected. The testimonial was designed and manufactured by Messrs. John Sari and Sons, of Cornhill.

PILRIG FREE CHURCH, EDINBURGH.

This handsome church, erected for the congregation under the pastoral superintendence of the Rev. W. G. Blaikie, was opened for public worship by the Rev. Dr. Horatius Bonar, of Leith, on Sunday last. The building which has cost £6000, and which is situated at the corner of Pilrig-street and Leith-walk, is a Gothic structure, exhibiting features to some extent peculiar to itself. The principal one is a nave running back from Leith-walk and crossed by double transepts, the pulpit being placed opposite the first transept and not centrally, the building presents to Leith-walk a centre gable, having on one side, at the junction of the two streets, a tower and spire, and on the other a shorter tower, surmounted by a conical roof. The principal feature in the side of the church facing Pilrig-street is a double gable, with a spirelet at the junction of the two. The gable fronting Leith-walk has the principal entrance flanked on each side with windows, which, with the door, are covered with ornamental pointed gables. Above the door is a large wheel-window, filled with tracery of a French character; and in each of the double gables fronting Pilrig-street, on the lower level, a range of three two-light windows, with tracery on the heads and gablets over them. The upper part of each of the full gables is occupied by a large pointed window, enriched with tracery, the upper part being also filled with a wheel-window, on a somewhat smaller scale than the corresponding opening in front. The gable behind the pulpit is constructed by a large pointed window, formed in three pentagons of a circle, and also filled with tracery. The tower, in which the side entrance from Pilrig-street is placed, is somewhat plain, till it reaches the height of the roof of the church. At this point it becomes enriched by triplet windows on each side, occupying the intervals between the buttresses, and then an octagonal spire with two-light openings and gablets on the four sides, corresponding with the faces of the tower. The spire rises to the height of 130 ft. The architectural details in the interior are chiefly in the arcade grouping of the ornamental portions. The base of the tower, where planness contributes to the appearance of solidity and ease, is unbroken, and the spire, which from its great altitude would have no direct except perhaps to injure the appearance of altitude, is also plain. The roof in the interior is of open timber-work, and the nave is lighted principally from the clerestory windows. The framework of the transept with that of the nave. The pulpit, pews, and other fittings are plain, but with the Gothic character still preserved. The architects are Messrs. Kinnear were the architects, and Mr. George Lorimer was the builder.

THE PARTITIONS OF POLAND.

THE indifference with which in past times the Governments of France and Great Britain have witnessed the partitions and unsuccessful insurrections of Poland has been dearly expiated. The dictum which Prince Metternich uttered in 1815 concerning the heavy price which Western Europe paid for its inaction in the eighteenth century has now become a complete article of the political creed of philosophy. That celebrated dictum was to this effect:—"The partition which blotted Poland's name from the list of nations was the prelude, and, in reality, the cause, of the disorders which convulsed Europe." For its failure to help the cause of the Poles in 1830-1 Europe has been punished by the terrible insurrection which has just been crushed, we may add, the Lombard campaign. Polish and French physicians assert that the cholera which visited Paris in 1831 was imported into Europe by the Cossack invaders of Poland, and disseminated from her putrefying battle-fields. Judging of the future from the past, it is to be apprehended that the Polish partitions will be consummated once more in vain, will not fail unavenged, and that a portion of their blood money will be exacted from the partitioning powers by the very hand they turned a deaf ear to their appeals.

The history of the insurrection, whether in her brilliant days or in her opprobrious hour of captivity, cannot be understood without a historical map. Such a map we present to our readers to-day. Previously to Poland's dismemberment in 1772 she was the first partition and before her ancient territorial divisions had been superseded by the new system. A glance at the map will show the reader that the example of emancipating their serfs, prominent among whom was the Chancellor Zamoyski, the leaders in our day of the Polish emigration. Those which met in 1791 emancipated the serfs from the restriction of the liberum veto, increased the national army to 100,000 men, and demanded the instant evacuation of the kingdom by the Russian troops. The Constitution of 1791 was studied, as we have intimated, by the aristocracy of Poland, who were quite alive to the liberal movement for self-reform. That great Revolution, which alarmed the aristocracy of the rest of Europe, was welcomed by the aristocracy of Poland, as the principles of liberty and equality were made the bases of the reformed Constitution of May 3, 1791. This Constitution was due to the admiration of every Liberal mind in Europe, and drew forth even from the lips of Edmund Burke a eulogium. Burke's admiration, however, covered the emancipation of the serfs, the freedom of commerce and worship, and how the Constitution of 1791 was framed to keep those separated the noblesse from the bourgeoisie. The liberum veto was formally abolished. The recusant nobles, the confederates of Targowica, mustered their forces.

The Casina now stood forth as the patron of the old Constitution and the then unconstitutional privileges of the nobility. Lately concluding a peace with the Sultan (Aug. 4, 1791) with whom she had been at war for three years, Russia was free to direct her attention once more to Poland. The Constitution of May 3 was stigmatised as the work of anarchists and Jacobins. Frederick William of Prussia, who had concluded a treaty with Poland on March 29, 1790, by which the Poles bound themselves to assist him against Russia and Austria and to guarantee the Prussian succession to Danzig, Thorn, and Posen, his solemn engagements, and prepared to join the Czarina in the second act of partition. On May 18, 1792, Catherine of Russia declared war, and 100,000 troops of the line and 20,000 Cossacks, entered Poland. The Polish army, in three divisions, headed by Joseph Poniatowski, Michael Wielhorski, and Prince Joseph Lubomirski, advance to the invaders. Had the King proved faithful at this crisis Poland might yet have been saved. But the ally the effeminate Stanislaus joined the Confederation of Targowica and repudiated the acts of the Constitutional Diet. The Confederation was disbanded, the country was left open to its murderers. The Prussian troops had meanwhile entered Great Poland. The Constitution of May 3 was set aside and the second act of partition was concluded at Petersburg. Catherine claimed her frontier into the middle of Lithuania and Volhynia, and Frederick William had the remainder of Great Poland, Great Poland, and Little Poland, and the towns of Dantzic and Thorn for his share of the spoil. Austria, however, had designs upon Cracow. Recruiting out a number of patriots sought refuge in Dresden and Leipsic. In March, 1794, Kosciusko reappeared at Cracow and joined Madalinski, who had already taken up arms in the country. The Russians were driven out of Warsaw by the sycthemen, and Kosciusko was proclaimed Dictator of Poland. The Lithuanian Army of Poland drove the Russians out of Wilna. Frederick William sent 40,000 Prussians to aid the Czarina and her puppet King, who was styled "the rebellion." At the end of June the Emperor Francos of Austria joined the coalition, and marched 30,000 men into Little Poland, but without obtaining any decisive forces. Towards July Prince Poland now rees in revolt, and gave occupation to the Prussian forces. Warsaw, Dantzic, and Cracow successively rose against the Czar, drove them out of all Great Poland by the middle of September. In the meantime the Russian General Suwarrow had marched against the Polish army of Kosciusko. On the 10th of October the fatal battle of Maciejowice, in Little Poland, was fought, when "Freedom shrieked," and Kosciusko fell, wounded, a prisoner. Suwarrow, with the bulk of Suwarrow, or narrate the massacre of Praga, "the bloodiest picture in the history of war." On the east bank of the Vistula drunk by the cup of vengeance. On the 24th of October, 1795, the treaty for the third and final partition of Poland was signed. The young King was forced to abdicate on the 25th of November, and the victors indulged themselves in the hope that they had not only blotted the name of Poland from the list of nations, but had blotted it from men's memories.

By this third partition Russia acquired the remaining portion of Lithuania, and a great part of Samogitia, part of Chelm on the right of the Bug, and the rest of Volhynia, Austria acquired the rest of Chelm, part of the palatinate of Cracow, the palatinates of Sandomir and Lublin, with a part of the district of Chelm, and the parts of the palatinates of Brzesch, Podlachia, and Masovia, situated on the left bank of the Bug. Prussia had the portions of the palatinates of Masovia and Podlachia on the right bank of the Bug; in Lithuania, part of the palatinate of Trcoi and Samogitia, which is on the left bank of the Niemen; and a district of Little Poland, forming part of Masovia and Cracow. Thus, the banks of the Pilica, the Vistula, the Bug, and the Niemen marked out the frontiers of Russia, Prussia, and Austria.

What were the sentiments of the two great Powers of the West on the occasion of the second and third partitions? Britain, bound in close alliance with the three partitioning Powers, with a view to the suppression of the French Revolution, was under the humiliating necessity of winking at all the crimes perpetrated by her allies. It was easy for Englishmen in those days of anti-Jacobin delirium to persuade themselves that aristocratic Poland was a Jacobinical Power which deserved no sympathy. The French Republicans were preoccupied with their own troubles, and ensured themselves for not espousing the cause of Poland on the plea that she was a monarchical, orthodox, and aristocratic nation. Thus the Poles could please neither the Jacobins nor the anti-Jacobins. Nevertheless, the French Republic was not wholly deaf to the appeals of the Polish exiles who flocked to Paris and Venice. In 1797 a Polish legion was formed by the Provisional Government of the Cisalpine Republic (with the sanction of the Directory). Its commander was General Dombrowski. The Polish Legions in the French service now became the representatives of their nationality before Europe, and were frequently praised for their valour by Bonaparte.

The battle of Jena (Oct. 14, 1806) and the occupation of Berlin by the French raised anew the hopes of the Poles. In the following month an address was issued to the Polish nation by order of Napoleon, and over the signatures of Generals Dombrowski and Wybicki, calling upon them to throw off the foreign yoke. Before the end of that year Napoleon had entered Warsaw, and the Prussian portions of Poland were cleared of Prussian and Russian troops. The Poles fought splendidly at Friedland (June 14, 1807), and, at the conclusion of the treaty of Tilsit, the portions of ancient Poland conquered from Prussia were, with one exception,* formed into an independent Government, under the title of the Duchy of Warsaw. It consisted of about 1800 square leagues. Frederick Augustus, King of Saxony, the same whom the Constitution of the 3rd of May had called to the throne after the death of Stanislaus, was chosen by Napoleon to be Grand Duke of Warsaw. The constitution was in general harmony with the principles of the French Revolution of 1789 and the Polish Constitution of 1791. The Code Napoleon was introduced. In 1809 Austria declared war against France, and invaded the Grand Duchy of Warsaw without any preliminary declaration of hostilities against the Saxon-Polish Government. The Poles retaliated by invading Austrian Poland, and in a brilliant campaign entirely liberated Galicia. At the treaty of peace, signed at Vienna on the 14th of October, the Poles were again deceived by Napoleon. Only four departments of the Galician conquest—namely, Cracow, Radom, Lublin, and Siedlce—were added to the Duchy of Warsaw, while the circles of Tarnopol and Zbaraz were ceded to Alexander. The salt mines of Wieliczka were to be in common between Austria and the Duchy.

The hearts of the Poles again beat strong with hope in 1812, when Napoleon threatened Russia with invasion. Seventy thousand Poles marched in the vast army which Bonaparte led against Russia in that year. Napoleon again pledged his faith to the Poles. The Poles, under Prince Poniatowski, formed the fifth corps of the "grande armée," and distinguished themselves in the battles of Mir, Smolensko, and Borodino. All Lithuania was evacuated by the Russians. Had Napoleon consented to spend the winter of 1812-13 on this side of the Dwina his fate and that of the Poles would probably have been as bright as they were calamitous. The reluctant tide of Napoleon's shattered phalanxes drew after them the vengeful hosts of the Muscovites, who entered Warsaw in the early part of 1813. The Grand Duchy of Warsaw ceased to exist, and the National Government was succeeded by a Russian army of occupation. In virtue of these events Russia claimed, at the Congress of Vienna, to hold this part of Poland by the simple right of conquest.

At the first meeting of the Congress of Vienna, in 1814, France, Great Britain, and Austria were anxious to re-establish the independence of Poland in its integrity. It is even said that war was on the eve of being declared by these three Powers against Russia and Prussia. However this may have been, the sudden return of Napoleon from Elba dissipated these projects, and made the Czar the master of the situation. On May 3, 1815, the Congress of Vienna decided on the fate of Poland. The 5th article of the treaty between Russia and Austria declared that the Duchy of Warsaw should be formed into a kingdom to be united to the Crown of Russia, but to enjoy a separate Constitution and administration. The portion of Eastern Galicia which had formed part of the Duchy was now ceded to Austria, as well as the salt mines of Wieliczka. Cracow, with its territory, was created into a republic, with a distinct Constitution. A portion of the Duchy was also given to Prussia, under the title of the Grand Duchy of Posnania. The remainder of the Duchy became what is now called "the Kingdom" or Congress Poland.

Of the violation of the promises held out to the Poles by the three guilty Powers in 1815, and solemnly guaranteed by the treaties of Vienna, we have not here to treat, as their breach involved no territorial change. In November, 1830, the Poles of Congress Poland broke out in insurrection. In September, 1851, the message of Marshal Sebastiani was received that "order reigned in Warsaw," and from that day until the present "Congress" Poland has been reduced to the level of a province of the Muscovite empire.

The last territorial change within the limits of ancient Poland was the annexation to Austria of the Free Republic of Cracow by treaty between the three partitioning Powers. This act took place in 1846, in spite of the protests of M. Guizot and Lord Aberdeen.

To believe that the present map of Europe, so far as it relates to the territories of ancient Poland, represents a durable order of things, would be to doubt the future progress of the human race—to despair of civilization. The blood which is being spilt so freely now will not have been spent altogether in vain, even should the Poles once more succumb to the power of Russia. The memory of their ineffectual heroism and futile appeals to the West will affict the conscience of Europe, and in the remorse of the civilized world Poland has a guarantee that there will be for her, as there has been for Greece, Roumania, and Italy, a day of resurrection and reconstruction.

* The exception was the district of Bialystock which was ceded to the Emperor Alexander.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has appointed Joseph Burke, Esq., of Fitzwilliam-place, and of Elm Hall, in the county of Tipperary, to be one of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the city of Dublin.

Mr. Faraday has been chosen corresponding member of the Imperial Academy of Medicine, Paris, by 52 votes out of 53. The French Academy has come to a vote on the successor to M. Biot, when M. Littré only found twelve supporters, M. De Cormé getting eighteen; four blank suffrages were found in the ballot-box.

POLAND.—THE DIPLOMATIC SITUATION.

WHEN those who sympathise in earnest with the Poles in the heroic contest in which they are engaged against Russia learned that notes had been addressed simultaneously to the Czar by Austria, England, and France, they may have been glad that such diplomatic action had been taken; but it is doubtful whether they entertained much hope of its being followed by any immediate or satisfactory results. In theory, perhaps, there was a certain grandeur in the spectacle of three of the foremost Powers in Europe interfering in unison on behalf of a struggling nationality. In this case, however, it may well be supposed that community of action did not involve identity of sentiment; and, assuredly, in the replies which Russia has accorded to the several Powers, she has addressed herself to the peculiar feelings of each country on the Polish question with her accustomed diplomatic skill. It should be understood that, in the remonstrances which were forwarded to St. Petersburg, Austria naturally dwelt on the danger accruing to herself from disturbances in Russian Poland, both as regards her close vicinity to the scene of the revolt and the chance of infection reaching her own Polish subjects. France took the large and comprehensive ground of the agitation of the public mind of Europe; while England, with her usual stiff adherence to technicalities, dwelt on the necessity for the observance of the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna. Much greater tyros in the craft of diplomacy than those professors of the art who always surround the throne of Russia could have dealt easily with such communications, and accordingly we find that Russia has no difficulty in agreeing entirely with Austria, that she expresses herself as being in perfect accordance with France, and sees no necessity for joining issue with England. The qualifications which accompany each of the replies are equally characteristic.

With a touch of irony Prince Gortschakoff informs Austria that a return to order by a revolted kingdom does not depend on interior measures alone; and he implies, although he does not exactly say, that there was such a thing once as a rebellion in Hungary, which was not put down by the moral action or the physical force of the Sovereign whose dominion was threatened, but in reality by the intervention of a foreign Power, the name of which it is not necessary at that moment to specify. With equal propriety France is informed that Russia is fully convinced of the necessity of a good understanding between the Emperors of the respective nations in order to secure a pacific solution, not of a single question, but of all the questions which are disturbing the repose of Europe; and that Russia would be prepared to submit, not the Polish question only, but the questions, real or imaginary, to which admission is made, to a European Congress. If this means anything at all it suggests a consideration by a Congress of the territorial boundaries of the nations of the Continent and, consequently, the subject of the nationality of Poland would become a subsidiary instead of the prime question. Happily for England, it was not in the power of the Minister of the Czar to resort on her the subjugation of another nationality by the aid of Europe, in answer to an appeal for clemency to Poland, as in the case of Austria; nor to insinuate the necessity of despotic co-operation for the carrying out of schemes of territorial aggrandisement, as in the case of France. There was no analogies or reminiscences, either express or implied, such as have been artfully introduced into the replies to the Courts of Paris and Vienna, in the answer which has been sent by Russia to England. In this case there is no room for sneering at dotages of constitutions and nationalities, and no hints of denial of the right to discuss the subject of treaty rights, national independence, and adherence to abstract legality. No such undercurrent of irony flows beneath the text of the Russian note to the Foreign Minister of England; nevertheless, it is quite as unsatisfactory as the answer addressed to France and Austria. It holds out hopes—indeed, it contains almost a specific promise—to discuss the question raised by England; but it is to be done at that time which Russia conceives to be consistent with her dignity and her rights to enter upon such a discussion, and the obvious query arises, Who is to decide?

The answer is to be found in the general tenor of Prince Gortschakoff's exposition of the policy of Russia in reference to her empire as a whole. He has laid it down that the first duty of every Government in the event of the insurrection is to restore authority, to secure peaceful citizens in the enjoyment of their lives, their property, and their industry; that it is only after the cessation of revolt that the clemency of a Sovereign should come into operation; and he states that, whereas popular discontents cannot be repressed by severity, they may perhaps be dissipated by clemency alone. The translation of all this is obvious enough. When severity has crushed out revolt, clemency will consider what is next to be done. It is, in fact, an assertion of the rightful supremacy of force, tempered by a mere concession to the feelings of the outer world which have been evinced in favour of Poland as is implied in an astute argument on the relative advantages of severity and clemency. In short, to sum up the result of the long series of diplomatic exposition, which culminated in the correspondence of to-day, no joint remonstrance of the three Powers to Russia, it amounts to nothing more nor less than this, that the revolt in Poland is to be put down by the strong hand, and that then the Czar will bring to bear all his good intentions towards the Poles, which have been interfered with and interrupted by the ill-advised and untoward proceedings of a people who could not see the prospect of a constitutional Government and a restoration of nationality in the policy pursued towards them. For the present, then, diplomacy has done its best or its worst, as the case may be, and things are just as they were, so far as moral influence on the Polish question is concerned. Whether such a skilful rebuff as the three Powers have received from Russia will discourage them from further attempts at reasoning the Czar into their ideas of what he ought to do in reference to Poland, or whether they will be stimulated into something more pronounced, and tending more towards real action, remains to be seen. So far as a judgment can be formed of the effect of the Russian reply on the ruling influence at the Tuileries, it may be taken that the state of mind produced is eminently pacific. It may easily be imagined that Austria, wincing under Prince Gortschakoff's sarcasms, is not very anxious to enter into encounter of wits with him again; and, as England is likely to be constant to the policy of moral influence, and the avoidance of war for an idea, it is probable that Earl Russell will be content with an occasional exercise of his favourite taste for writing letters.

In the meantime the Poles, heedless of what is taking place elsewhere, are adopting the policy which is expressed in the Irish phrase of "going on never minding," are carrying on their rebellion with singular persistency and success, which would be surprising were it not that there seems to be a tacit sympathy between them and the Russian soldiery who are brought into operation against them. It is difficult otherwise to account for the defects, by half-armed peasants, of troops who have not so very long ago given infinite trouble to, and something more than held their own against, the picked battalions of France and England. It is confidently asserted that the Russian soldiers do not disguise their weariness of and distaste for a contest in which their antipathies are not enlisted. If this goes on, the period cannot be far distant when diplomacy must enter into another phase. A new question will arise, and it will be for what the Emperor of Russia will do, but what is the duty of Europe to Poland as a nation. At a very early stage of the civil war in America France and England acknowledged the belligerent rights of the Southern States; and it seems as if they must ere long consider whether the Poles have not reached such a point of secession, to use the most approved phrase, as will entitle them to a similar acknowledgment. At any rate, the Polish insurgents may depend upon this—that the more determination they show to help themselves the greater is their chance of obtaining the help of others.

PRESENTATION OF ADDRESSES TO THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

At Marlborough House, on Wednesday week, their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales received addresses of congratulation on their marriage from a great number of corporate and other public bodies. The addresses were about 180 in number, and the names of the places, from which the deputations of the persons by whom addresses were presented, occupied three columns in the daily papers. The members of the deputations appeared in either Court dress or uniform. The cards branded by the noblemen and gentlemen, containing the list of names and the different corporate and public bodies from which the addresses were intended, were sent to his Royal Highness by the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, Lord in Waiting. The Prince was also attended by Lieutenant-Colonel Keppel, Groom in Waiting; and by the Hon. Sir Frederick Knollys, Comptroller, Captain Grey, and Keppel Esquiries; and Mr. Herbert Fisher, Private Secretary. The Princess was attended by Lord Harris, K.S.I., Chamberlain; the Countess De Grey, Lady in Waiting; and the Hon. Mrs. Stonor, Bedchamber Woman in Waiting.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Princess Charles of Prussia has arrived in Paris, and paid a visit to the Tuileries on Saturday last, which has been returned by the Empress.

The Moniteur of Tuesday contradicts the rumour that the Prince of Wales is expected at Fontainebleau.

Tuesday being the 42nd anniversary of the death of the Emperor Napoleon I., a funeral service was performed at the Chapel of the Tuileries, and another at the Invalides.

The vote of credit to the French note reached Paris yesterday week, and was communicated to the Minister of Foreign Affairs the next day. On Saturday a council of Ministers was held over which presided my of the Emperor, to consider the despatch, the terms of which were inserted by the Ministerial journals to be "very conciliatory."

La Presse states that the election to the new Corps Législatif will commence on the 31st inst. of May, and the Parliament then formed will meet for a fortnight's Session in the opening of July.

The Patrie has the following letter from Madrid:—"I believe that you must not give note to bold public meetings without the express permission of the Government, in reference to the approaching general elections. Any paper reporting the resolutions of any such meeting will be prosecuted. Such is the order which has been given to-day. There has also been issued a decree which orders the fourth conscription of the Bouches-du-Rhone. The Count De Montalembert has the address of Lorgues, being himself to the electors of the Var (Draguignan-Dard).

The periodical exhibition of the works of living artists was opened yesterday week to the general public, at the Palace of Industry, in the Champs Elysées. Nearly three thousand works of modern art are included, including sculpture, drawings, architectural designs, and photography.

PRUSSIA.

The Crown Prince and the Crown Princess left Berlin yesterday week, accompanied by their Royal children, to take up their residence for a few months at Baden-Baden, and to be present at the festival of the arrival of the Queen at Baden-Baden, and of the reception accorded to her Majesty by the Grand Duke and Duchess of Baden on that occasion given in honour of the Royal visitor, and amongst other festivities was to be enacted a tableau vivant, in which the Princess Frederick Augustus of Holstein, the Baroness de Molbens, and many other prominent members of the fashionable circle at Baden, will appear. The performance was to be followed by a ball at the Salles des Fleurs.

The committee appointed by the Chamber of Deputies on the cartel convention between Prussia Russia have unanimously recommended that the convention to be invalid, and have proposed that the Government be requested to withdraw from carrying out the convention. The consent of the Chambers has been obtained. It has been resolved not to present an address to the King upon the foreign policy of the Government, as the Ministry fear that a debate thereon might lead to a conflict between the Chamber and the Government.

SWEDEN.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs informed the Diet on Saturday that on the 2nd and 7th ult. he addressed to the Russian Government a note respecting the Polish insurrection. The Diet subsequently passed resolutions expressing sympathy for Poland and confidence that the Government will do all in its power for the Poles. The resolutions of the Houses of Nobles and of Clergymen added a declaration of their confidence that the Government will have "regard to the maintenance of peace, which the public interest demands, and that the Diet, the House of Burgesses and of Peasants, less prudent, or more warm in the Polish cause than the three Houses, refused to append this declaration.

RUSSIA.

The Journal de St. Pétersbourg announces that the birthday of the Emperor has been celebrated in all the chief cities of the empire, and that loyal addresses have been taken to the Governors-General thereof.

An Imperial ukase has been published directing that corporal punishments shall in future only be employed in exceptional cases.

THE POLISH INSURRECTION.

The Journal de St. Pétersbourg of the 3rd inst. published the despatches addressed by England, France, and Austria to the Cabinet of St. Petersburg on the Polish question, and the answers returned to the same by Prince Gortschakoff. The reply to England is the last. The despatch is a very elaborate document, commencing with Earl Russell's claims on behalf of Poland, founded on the Treaty of 1815, and digresses of them on the strange plea that frequent treaties have been broken by the Powers themselves, and that Russia holds Poland by the right of conquest. It is the Poles themselves, says the Prince, "who surrender their nationality, and have become impossible, being reduced—by national aspirations? no, indeed! but by cosmopolite and revolutionary conspirators devoted to anarchy and disorder"; and seeking in Poland "a lever to overthrow the rest of Europe." However, the Emperor of Russia would obtain nothing further than a "durable peace" in his hereditary dependency. The system already instituted "is destined to lead to an administrative autonomy on the basis of the provincial institutions of the empire, which in England have been the starting-point and the foundation of the greatness and the prosperity of the country." The Poles, meanwhile, are fighting on, little concerned, apparently, with the progress of the diplomatic intervention in their favour. There are reports of several encounters, in the majority of which the Poles are described as having had the advantage. Telegrams from Cracow report a serious engagement on the 30th ult., between the insurgents and the Russian troops, in which the sportsmen carried the day. According to a telegram from Breslau, an engagement occurred on Monday, near the frontier of Prussian Silesia, between some Russian troops and a body of Polish insurgents. The Russians lost their guns and waggons, and some hundreds of them fled into Prussian territory. A telegram emanating from Cracow states that the Russian troops were not disarmed, and that they were escorted by way of Thorn as far as Alexandrowo. This statement is confirmed by news from Prussian sources. A telegram from Cracow, according to the Cracow, a body of 600 Russians were repulsed by Miniewski, at Olkusz, in the government of Radom.

From Warsaw we learn that the preferred resignation of Wielopo'ski has not been accepted.

The Russian Commander-in-Chief, General Berg, has asked the Government to replace all civil functionaries in the provinces by military officials.

TURKEY.

On the arrival of the Sultan at Constantinople, yesterday week, his Majesty was met by the great functionaries of State, and received the congratulations of the Diplomatic Corps. Illuminations were in honour of the occasion. In the evening the city and the Bosphorus were illuminated.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the steamers City of Bath more and Hibernian we have New York journals to the 25th ult.

WAR NEWS.

The Federal gun-boats on the Nansemond River, Eastern Virginia, and a Federal force co-operating therewith, have stormed a Confederate battery at Suffolk, and captured 200 prisoners.

The Confederates have abandoned the siege of Washington, North Carolina.

Admiral Dupont's iron-clad fleet still remains off Charleston Harbour. The Charleston Mercury asserts that the guns of the turbot Federal ironclad Keokuk have been recovered by the Confederates.

On the Mississippi there was considerable activity.

On the night of the 16th Admiral Porter, with seven gun-boats, ran run, and three transports, and failed to pass the Vicksburg batteries. One transport was obliged to return, another was burnt, and the rest supposed that all on board were lost. The remainder of the vessels passed safely. Eleven Federal gun-boats, including Admiral Farragut's three, are now below Vicksburg. They have destroyed the Confederate batteries at Grand Gulf, about twenty miles below Vicksburg, and are anchored off New Carthage, where General Grant's land-quarters are established. The point to which place a portion of General Grant's army had proceeded overland.

The steamer Conestoga, on the Ohio, recently captured by the Confederates, has been blown up by the Federal gun-boats and her crew captured. The Confederate steamer Diana has also been burnt on the Atchafalaya River.

A portion of the forces under General Banks was above Franklin, Louisiana, on the 14th inst. The object of General Banks's expedition was to capture Franklin, where all the Confederates below the Red River are supposed to be posted, and a victory at this place would open the way for an advance of the Federals to the Red River.

A Federal division had made an expedition from Greenville, Mississippi, up Deer Creek, for five days, destroying property on various plantations estimated at 3,000,000 dols., consisting of cottonwills, cotton-gins, 1,000 bales of cotton, and corn. They likewise brought away a considerable amount of stores.

The Confederate steamer Cayuga captured the Boston barque Lewis Wing on the 27th of March, and put four men and eighteen men on board. She has also captured the New York barque Conrad. About the same time the Alabama chased two vessels ashore in Turk's Island Passage.

RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Earl Russell's despatch of April 24, concerning the right of search in regard to British vessels trading with Matamoras, had created a favourable impression on American public opinion, which had been fortified by the action taken by the British Governor in stopping the Alexandra. For the present, the symptoms menacing to a continuance of peace have greatly subsided.

The case of the Petrolboat in passing before the New York Prize Court. The Petrolboat was delivered unqueried to the British Consul by order of the District Court.

The British gun-boat Cygnet was fired at on the 4th ult., in the Rebanna Channel, by the Federal steamer Connecticut, who mistook the Cygnet for the Alabama. The Captain of the Cygnet went on board the Connecticut, and the affair was amicably settled.

It is understood (says the Times) that the Government of the United States have resolved to send an agent to this country vested in matters of the highest importance, and who will be charged with full powers to treat with us on those points between the two countries. The object is to enable such questions in all possible cases to be settled promptly here, instead of their being made the subject of tedious correspondence.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have accepted an invitation to a ball at the Guildhall on the 1st of next month.

The exhibition of the Royal wedding presents at the South Kensington Museum was brought to a close on Monday night.

A new station on the Metropolitan Extension Line of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway has been opened at Somerset-road.

On Tuesday morning the parish church of St. Anne, Limehouse, was broken into and robbed by thieves.

The annual grand Caledonian ball, under the same distinguished patronage as in former years, has been arranged to take place at Willis's Rooms on Monday, June 8.

At the annual meeting of the members of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, held on Monday, Professor Donaldson was unanimously elected as chairman to the institute for the ensuing year, as successor to Mr. W. Tite, M.P., who resigned the chair.

Mr. Mitchell-Thomson read his highly interesting dramatic story of "Hearts are Trumps," on Saturday last, to a crowded audience, at the Whittington Club, Arundel-street, Strand, in reading which he was one of the hosts of the Printers' Almshouse Society.

The Government in reference to the Police Amalgamation Bill came off in the Guildhall on Tuesday. It was most numerously attended, and was unanimous in its condemnation of the proposal of the Secretary of State. The Lord Mayor presided. Aldermen and Sheriff Lawrence, Mr. Serjeant Merlay, Mr. Fowler, Mr. Hodgson, M.P., Mr. G. Moore, Mr. Cornwall, M.P., and Mr. Western Wood, M.P., were among the speakers.

At the weekly meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works, yesterday week, the chairman contended in respect to circulation that the property in the chairman contended in respect to circulation that the property in the engraving had exceeded its borrowing power by a million and a quarter sold. Of the latter amount allowed them by Parliament the board had expended £2,250,000. A report from Mr. Bonnigate showed that the sewage question was made during the month in the vicinity of the metropolitan drainage.

The foundation-stone of a new bridge across the Thames was laid on Saturday near the ancient site of Blackfriars Bridge, by Lord Sandys. The new bridge, which will be about fifty yards distant from the old one, will, when completed, connect the City, Chandos, and Strand Bridges with the Metropolitan line in Farringdon-street, thus completing the southern railway communication with the Great Northern, North Eastern, and Great Western Railways.

The Court of Queen's Bench have dismissed the appeal made to them against the verdict in the case of Graham v. Ball, involving the right to obtain photographic copies of an engraving without the consent of the copyright. The verdict was for Mr. Gambart, the owner of the engraving, and therefore therefore settles the case in favour of the right of the owner of the engraving to prevent the sale of copies made by photographs.

On Saturday evening Burlington House was again thrown open for a conversazione, held by General Sabine, as President of the Royal Society. The Prince of Wales and Princess of Wales were present, with the president Dr. Sharpey and Professor Stokes, secretaries; Sir Philip Egerton, treasurer; Mr. Bentham, Mr. A. Miller, treasurer of the Royal Society. The reception-rooms were furnished with interesting scientific apparatus of every description, and numerous objects of interest were exhibited.

Last week the births of 1075 children—1002 boys and 973 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1853-62 the average number (corrected) was 1291. The deaths in London last week also exhibited a considerable decrease, having fallen to 1074, which is a lower number than any that has been returned since the first week of March. The average number of deaths, as derived from the ten years 1853-62, is nearly corresponding with last week, and corrected for increase of population, to 1187. Of these deaths from smallpox were registered 2, from measles 14, from fever of which occurred at the age of twenty years and upwards.

The annual report of the Zoological Society of London gives a statement of the species bred in the society's gardens during the past year. Those were, among the mammalia, the axis deer, Indian deer, Cervine deer, African civet cat, lion, tiger, leopard, puma, Polar bear; wapiti, Persian, Japanese, common, and hog deer; Indian, Japan, Persian fallow deer; Barbary sheep, zebu, yak, guanaco, hyrax, agouti, Australian kangaroo, vulpine opossum; amongst the birds were various pheasants, crowned pigeon, Demoiselle crane, and turquoise, the weaver-bird, kakapo, Cape francolin, scarcely, American flamingo, Australian crane, and the turtle dove. Eighty species are recorded in the American water-fowl.

The annual meeting of the Royal Institution of Great Britain was held on Monday—the Duke of Northumberland, K.G., F.R.S., president, in the chair. The annual report of the committee of visitors for the year 1862 was read and adopted. Thanks were voted to the officers of the house, and secretary, to the committees of managers and visitors, and to Professor Brande for his gratuitous professional services as honorary secretary during the past year. The following gentlemen were re-elected to the various offices:—The president, the Duke of Northumberland; treasurer, William Fotz, F.S.A.; secretary, Henry Bence Jones. New commissariat managers and visitors were also appointed.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held on Tuesday—the Duke of Somerset, president of the society, in the chair. A reward of £11 was voted to the crew of the Seaton Carew life-boat, belonging to Hartlepool, for putting off in rough weather and sea-on the night of the 12th ult., and rescuing the crew of seven men from the brig Rapsida, of Whitby, which had sunk during the previous night, and in a gale, off Seaton Carew. This valuable life-boat had already been the means of saving twenty-eight lives from different shipwrecks. A gold medal of the late W. M. Kerrich, Esq., to the institution. The silver medal of the institution was voted to Mr. Robert Hood, the gallant coxswain of the Tynemouth life-boat, in acknowledgment of his long and valuable services in that life-boat to ships in distress, and to the crew of which he is a large number of honorary presses. The silver medal of the institution and a copy of its vote on parchment were voted to Mr. Thomas Bennett, master of the schooner Ann Gill of Scarborough, for his gallant conduct on the 16th of March last, in rescuing the crew of the Norwegian brig Ingeborg, of Arendal, from the wreck of the Carlton, off Filey Brigg, on the 15th of March. Vellum certificates of the institution were also voted to the crews of shore boats and others for saving life from wrecks. During the year the institution granted rewards for the saving of 1,281 persons in lieu of one previously stationed there. It was reported that Mr. Thomas Gibson, of Hartlepool, had presented to the institution a boat to enable it to place a large life-boat at Lytham—a most dangerous locality on the Lancashire coast. An interesting correspondence between Captain Robertson, R.N., the Assistant Inspector of Life-boats of the institution on the Welsh coast, and the crew who had recently visited the Scilly Islands in a good sailer. Captain Ward, R.N., the Inspector of the institution, was directed to proceed to Ireland to examine the harbours of that country with a view of that country. Payments amounting to nearly £600 having been made at various life-boat establishments, the proceedings terminated.

The annual dinner of the Royal Academy was held last Saturday at Sir Charles Eastlake, president, in the chair, at 7 o'clock. There were also present the Prince of Wales and Prince Louis of Hesse, the Duke of Somerset, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and many of the nobility in every walk of literature, science, and art. The Prince of Wales and Prince Louis of Hesse had made speeches. The president, in proposing the health of the Prince of Wales, who spoke evidently under deep emotion, but in a peculiarly clear and distinct tone of voice, and with great composure of manner, said:—"Sir Charles Eastlake, your Royal Highnesses, my Lord, and Gentlemen,—In the most comfortable position I have ever been placed, and sorrow that I rise to return you thanks in the name of myself and the Royal family, for the honour in which you, Sir Charles, have proposed our health, and for the very cordial way in which this distinguished assembly has received it. I cannot on this occasion refrain from making a few observations connected with my beloved and lamented father. His brief, example cannot but stimulate my efforts to lead the life which, above all whatever my shortcomings may be, I may at least promise to participate in the interests which he held in every department of life, whether connected with and science in this country, but more especially in the prosperity of the Royal Academy. I have only a moment, I say now to thank you, Sir Charles, and the Royal family, and I may be permitted to add, how sincerely I appreciate, the sentiments which have been expressed with reference to myself. I have only to say my gratitude for what you have been pleased to say in the name of the Royal family, for the honour in which you have drunk my health and that of the Princess. While I return my warmest thanks in both our names, I take this opportunity of expressing my devotion and gratitude to your honoured Queen and her family, and my profound admiration of this great and noble country, to which I am most sincerely attached." The Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Somerset, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Palmerston, Lord Elcho, Sir B. Murchison, and Mr. Thackeray were also among the speakers.

A large body of men are employed at the Guildhall in preparing for the removal of the roof, and the substitution of one similar to that of Westminster Hall. The cost will be £18,000, and, with other improvements, a total of £26,700 will be expended upon the building and its approaches.

On Tuesday next, by order of the Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, a review will take place in Hyde Park.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS OF RELIGIOUS AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.—The anniversary of the meeting of the London City Mission Missionary Society was held on Tuesday at Exeter Hall. The Earl of Chichester presided. There have been a falling off in funds, the society this year being some thousands of pounds less than last. The income of the year was £39,000, and the expenditure £41,000. There are 150 stations, with 266 clergymen, of whom 139 are English, 41 foreigners, and 86 native pastors. The number of Sunday-school teachers, 1,913 visitors, 1,913 masters, &c.; 9 European female teachers, 1,913 native and country boys and girls, 1,913 adult baptisms, 1,913 communicants, and 1,913 catechumens.

The annual meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society was held on Monday at Exeter Hall; Mr. J. Heald, Manchester, in the chair. The total receipts during the year had been £141,638, which exceeded those of 1861 by £3,000. The expenditure had been £144,000, which was £6,000 more than the receipts, which, added to a previous deficiency, left £6429 due to the treasurer. Of the 1,913 ministers, seventeen were supernumeraries and seventeen of missionaries had been sent out, and ten missionaries and four wives of missionaries had been called home by the Committee. The numbers of the Wesleyan body as follows:—The number of circuits in connection with the society throughout the world was 1,913; ministers, 1,913; local preachers, 1,913; regular total teachers 1,913; adult baptisms, 1,913; members in society, 1,913; Sabbath and day scholars in the Sabbath-schools, 1,913; day-schools, 1,913; scholars, 1,913. In addition to the foregoing and colonial secretaries, giving a satisfactory account of the state of the missionary work.

The annual meeting of the Home and Colonial School Society was held on Tuesday, in Exeter Hall—Lord Lichfield in the chair. The chair. The report of the last year's proceedings shows that 138 students have been only trained in the institution, and that 1,913 have left it. The total population and in old schools attached to the institution 600 children are efficiently taught. The report also referred to the fact that the Committee of Council, owing to the alterations consequent on the Revised Code. The report of the Rev. F. Watkins, the head master of the training institution, stated that the students were most satisfactory. At the last Government examination every teacher who had been trained in the institution, Chudleigh, and Gloucester obtained honours. The annual meeting of the Governesses' Benevolent Institution was held on Tuesday, at the institution, Harley-street, Cavendish-square, the Lord Bishop of Oxford in the chair. The report stated that the number of governesses relieved by the institution was 1,913, and that 1,913 had been admitted to the institution. The receipts for the year had been £1,913, and the expenditure £1,913. The receipts of the previous fund during 1862 were £1,913, making the whole sum expended in this branch £10,913. For the present year the Committee have to report increasing business, having received four additional annuitants, and having been compelled to fund £1,913 to meet the claims of the ladies' committee, has proved of great utility during the past year: 726 applications have been received, of which 1,913 have been successful while waiting a vacancy. The registration continues its steady course, and out of 1,913 who have entered their names, 1,913 have obtained situations. For the aged, only five of the twenty-two inmates being under sixty years of age, and the necessity of frequent visits to the hospital. The total receipts for the year have been—Even Mrs. Cutts, £1000; Mrs. Veiten, £100; and Dr. Roberts, £100. The total receipts for the year amounted to £1,913 19s. 10d.; and the expenditure, £11,410

SPRING.

We have already noticed the bright and pleasant picture by Mr. Hill, which we now engrave, in our review of the exhibition in which it finds a place—namely, that of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street. In that notice we felt bound to observe that the painter, in order to obtain the bright and pleasing effectiveness to which we allude, had freely employed the artistic license of rendering the complexion of this laughing lassie and her chubby burden fairer than they would be found in nature. At all events, we do not remember to have seen such white and red—at least the former—in the rustic, homeliest, weather-embrowned girls we have met with in our rambles about the moors and valleys of wild Wales, where the artist probably found his models. We beg still to persist in our incredulity till the painter tells us, as he does not in the title of his picture, the exact locality where such dainty and yet such healthy, comely, and well-conditioned lassies are to be found. However, should Mr. Hill persevere in guarding his secret, we must console ourselves in the assurance that Old Time will avenge us. He will soon make the summer amounted to £1250. The Museum cost the country last year, £99,012; the estimate for next year is but £90,841. About half this amount is required for salaries and house expenses; and some £20,000 for printed books, bookbinding, preparing, &c. Some of the special purchases may stagger the unlettered, and would have perturbed Cobbett, who affected to view the Museum as "a bundle of dead insects." Among such startling items are,—Meteorites, £411; a specimen of nephrite, or mass of green jade from Russia, £376; and £500 for completing the publication of the cuneiform inscriptions. The visitor unable to appreciate these matters of high science may, however, enjoy "the birds, beasts, and fishes" of the zoological galleries; and may almost read history in stone, as he walks through the Assyrian rooms.

The cataloguing of the printed books has proceeded; but to detail the transferring, incorporations, and reinscriptions would be of little interest. We perceive that the estimate for 1863-4 includes two extra transcribers, which is hopeful. The number of "readers" in 1862 averaged 419 a day, and each reader consulted on an average ten volumes in a day. The total number of articles received for the library in 1862, including broadsides and ballads, was 73,929.

The additions to all departments have been numerous. Of prime interest and value is the foreign collection of stone implements, including the large accessions of this year, which have been arranged in a parallel series to the British collection, with the requisite fittings and labels. Among the additions are two flint implements from the drift at Herne Bay; a stone hammer found near Halmeton, in the county of Fife; a collection of flint implements, partly from the drift beds near Abbeville and partly from later formations in the same neighbourhood, presented by M. Boucher de Perthes, of Abbeville. (Some English geologists, now on a visit to M. Boucher de Perthes, we perceive, suspect "mystification" of his flint heaps. See Athenæum, April 25). The remaining acquisitions of this class include an extensive collection of stone implements found in Denmark, and some specimens from Portugal, all illustrating the earlier periods of British antiquities. There are also stone implements from Chiriqui and Peru, Canada West, and British Columbia. We need scarcely add that these acquisitions are of paramount importance to the student of "The Antiquity of Man."

Some valuable objects from a tomb at Camiros, in the island of Rhodes, include a vase painted with figures in red and opaque white on a black ground. The subject is the surprise of Thetis by Peleus, "the same scene which is represented on one side of the Portland vase. The received explanation of that celebrated composition, first proposed by the late Mr. Millingtion, is thus strikingly confirmed." (C. T. Newton.) The style is about the time of Alexander the Great, the drawing is free and masterly, and thought to be the work of Protogenes. Another striking object is a terra-cotta lamp, in the form of a galley, found at Tomuoli, and remarkable for its size, form, and singular figures. It is about 2 ft. in length.

To the Coins and Medals 1858 additions have been made, and 1644 persons have visited the collections. Among the Greek additions are a Syracusan medallion, a silver coin of Cyprus, a very small silver coin of Athens, a unique stater of Bithynia, a silver coin of Alexander Zigus, struck in Egypt, and of extreme rarity; and several autonomi coins of the Ptolomies. Roman—A very rare solidus of Constantine the Great, a silver and a copper coin of Carausius. Byzantine—A very rare gold coin of Heraclius and his eldest son, and thirteen coins of the rare class of Vitigothic Kings of Spain.

Professor Owen's report on the Department of Natural History shows how cramped he is for room. Choice rarities are unexhibited, and in storage were injured by damp. Host was then introduced, but this affects the specimens preserved in spirits of wine, necessitating its decomposition and evaporation; of other specimens it is stated "they have been kept by great expenditure of time and labour in their present state of preservation;" the material of the mammalia are almost as crowded as the genus homo is at a public show; the exhibited birds are better off; but each class of zoology is now so filled that specimens have to be removed to make room for new comers of greater rarity; really these stored and stuffed collections are almost as troublesome to provide for as their living congeners. There were 13,120 additions last year, including the Troglodytes vellerosus, Gray, discovered by Captain Burton in west tropical Africa, an instructive addition to the Anthropoidæe. Here, also, are a new tortoise from Cochin-China, a new lizard from the Fejee Islands, two remarkable innocuous snakes from Central America, and from Africa a viper living in trees, discovered by Captain Burton in the Cameroon district. We should add that the completion of the series of the Fishes of the Nile, important not only for the naturalist, but also for the archæologist, has been greatly assisted by her Majesty's Consul at Khartoum, so that the British Museum now possesses the finest collection of the fishes of the Nile. Among the fresh-water fishes received from the western coasts of Africa are some new species which are extremely interesting—one having the lower lip produced into a long cone. Rare and acceptable additions have accrued to all the departments of natural history through the International Exhibition. The extensive series of examples of coal, lignite, and allied forms of petrified and carbonised vegetable matters from the carboniferous strata of the Austrian dominions, is replete with interest in its economical relations.

In Geology the most important acquisition during the year is the collection of Solenhofen fossils, purchased of Dr. Häberlein, of Pappenheim, Bavaria, and including the remarkable fossil bird Archæopteryx macrurus, recently described to the Royal Society by Professor Owen. Its matrix belongs to the upper colitic period, the most ancient in which the fossil remains of a bird have hitherto been discovered. The fishes are beautifully preserved on 160 flat slabs.

To the collection of Mineralogy have been added 1,200 specimens, including the collection of artificial crystals, which excited universal admiration in the Austrian court of the International Exhibition. To the collection of zeolites have been added several specimens, including two large stones

"SPRING," BY J. J. HILL, IN THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

"THE WANING YEAR."

At the Royal Academy banquet, on Saturday last, many well-deserved compliments were paid to the landscape-painters of England by Sir Roderick Murchison and Lord Palmerston. It is hardly, however, within the walls of the Academy that the real importance and position of British landscape-painters can be fully appreciated. The insufficient space in Trafalgar-square for the exhibition of the art of England tells peculiarly to the disadvantage of the landscape-painter. When the best placesare occupied (according to their "prescriptive" right) by the members of the academic body, and the claims of the figure-painters have been apportioned, little space near "the line" remains for the poor landscapist. However, the picture—the engraving of which is the first we have been enabled to get ready of the series we purpose offering from the works in this year's exhibition—has not been treated very ill at the hands of the "hanging committee."

"The Waning Year" is one of the largest and most elaborate productions we have seen from Mr. Hulme, a landscape-painter of thoroughly genuine feeling for homely English scenery, and who, though possessed of very considerable executive ability, never indulges in display, never attempts exceptional or unapproachable aspects of nature, nor wanders from the facts before him. The picture under consideration has, however, more variety of picturesque element than usual. We are not sufficiently in the artist's confidence, nor does our memory serve us, to report the exact spot represented. It may be on the banks of the Thames—nay, it probably is; but it may possibly be near the margin of some other of our many inland streams. But what matter? Such scenes of placid picturesqueness are too common in pleasant, dear old England to make its identification of the slightest consequence. Familiar enough are glimpses such as these of silvery reaches of stream or river; common enough the little brooklet, fringed with dwarf dock, tall grasses, and plantain, running hands for a time, but always eager to overtake its solater companion; the stubbly polards, young beeches, and groups of (more distant) variegated foliage; whilst on any road, magically chequered with sun and shade, might we be passed by—or pass at the frequent loitering places—the pony-mounted messenger and his inquisitive dog; or see the farm-servant drive the cattle into the new pastures and fragrant meadows. While looking at our Engraving, however, we must call upon the reader to exercise a little of the imagination, of which Lord Palmerston tells us landscape representations are so provocative, in order to realise the sero and yellow leaf—

> Autumn laying here and there
> A fiery finger on the leaves, which chiefly suggests the title of the picture. He may then, if he pleases, whether engaged at desk or counter, bank or board, counting-house or workshop, session or court, fancy that the drudgery of his week's work is over, and that he has escaped to the peace and pleasantness of such rustic sights and sounds as the painter represents.

ADDITIONS TO THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THE annual Parliamentary Return of the British Museum has just been printed, and presents several data which it may be interesting to place in a more attractive form than that of lists and tables, of which the official document consists.

The International Exhibition led to the great increase in the number of visitors in 1862 of 253,191; the numbers being, in 1861, 641,886, and in 1863, 895,077; but in 1851, the first Exhibition year, there were above 2,500,000. It must, however, be remembered that the latter was the first year of admitting all visitors to the libraries; and the classes likely to avail themselves of the privilege were far more numerous in 1851 than 1862. The expenses for extra facilities last from Madras, one weighing 150 lb.—the most important accession of its class received for many years; also a fine specimen of the Indian concord stone, 17 in. Here, likewise, are a green turquoise (4 lb. 3 oz.) and a ruby spinel, taken from the Summer Palace, Pekin; and a most valuable and choice series of gold ornaments, amongst the most important localities in the British colonies. The general arrangement now greatly aids the detailed study of the collection, as well as the crystallography of the collection.

In Botany, among the principal additions is the valuable series of plants, including important herbaria of Bay, Dale, Rand, and Nicholls, presented by the Company of Apothecaries.

To the Prints and Drawings has been added a fresh selection, intended to show the progress made in England in the arts of design and engraving from the reign of Henry VIII. to the middle of the eighteenth century. These are exhibited on screens in the King's Library, and are thus accessible to the visiting public. Some portraits early German woodcuts, and many British and foreign portraits, are also among the additions; as is also a collection, by the late Mr. George Scharf, of sketches of Gothic and Renaissance buildings in which have since been destroyed. Mr. Buckler has presented a large collection of drawings and sketches illustrating the history of the Priory of Bermondsey, in three volumes folio. Among the items of personal interest is a watch, date 1631, inscribed with the name of John Milton, and presumed to have belonged to the poet, presented by decree of the late Sir Charles Fellows. The work of publishing the cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria has been continued, and some hundred and fifty tablets have been copied on stone.

These are but a few of the acquisitions of the past year, more especially such as are of popular interest. It is gratifying to add that in each department the results are numerous and important.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1863.

NOT one of the least graceful evidences that the Heir Apparent intends to interest himself in the refined as well as the manly pursuits of society, was afforded by his Royal Highness's presence at the Academy dinner on Saturday. Leaving his young brother to the enjoyment of the masculine of Cambria and the noble singing of Tamberlik, the Prince took his seat among the pictures, and at a board where was assembled a large number of persons notable for rank and wealth only, but where he also did credit to rank and wealth had been gained by intellectual exertion. He can dine with Peers and Bishops any day, but it is well that his Royal Highness should sometimes be a fellow-guest with Murchison, Kinglake, Lyell, Babbage, Whewell, Owen, and Thackeray.

The Prince's speech was in the best taste, and the references to his father and to his wife were made with a simple earnestness that went to the hearts of his hearers. It was not to be expected, nor was it expected, that on the first occasion of his rising at an Academy feast a very young man should philosophise upon the art which had brought that distinguished party together, or should assume the office of a teacher or guide. But the speeches of his accomplished father upon such occasions are doubtless as well preserved in the Prince of Wales's memory as they are in the memory of those who heard them; and we may reasonably believe that the elevated artteaching which he was privileged to receive from Prince Albert will, when his son shall have reached more mature years, be found to have opened to him larger views of art than are usually entertained by the patronising speeches of great persons. There is not, for instance, a better officer, or a more kindly-natured gentleman, than the Prince who returned thanks for the Army; and his genial talk was the last that could excite or deserve an unfriendly word, and it is merely in support of the preceding proposition that we say that one of these days we hope to hear from the Colonel of the 10th Hussars something more like what his late father, a Field Marshal, would have said than the jolly kind of compliment which he makes a capital subject for a painter. The First Lord of the Admiralty had nothing to say, except that the Academicians were no doubt thoroughly attached to the Navy of England, upon which the only reason can be that it is a service, the hardest kind of religion; and, although he necessarily had to advert to "altered circumstances," it was evident that the spiritual head of the English Church held none of the absurd doctrines of those who see in the fine arts nothing more than an elegant amusement. He testified to its high and noble mission, and specially indicated two pictures as illustrating his meaning. The piety of childhood, as shown in Mr. Millais' delightful work, which represents a little girl for the first time in the house of prayer, was one of these; and the other was Mr. Phillip's admirable group of politicians, in reference to which the Archbishop dwelt upon the fact which we pointed out some time since—namely, that, for the time at least, that painting would derive its chief interest—apart from its remarkable artistic merits—from the striking and fast and faithful portraiture of a great and good man who has lately been called to his rest. In the days of sensation writing and sensation painting no true man will fall to join in the hope of the Archbishop, that art may be mindful of its duty to elevate the moral tone of the people, and to prompt to what is good, generous, and noble.

The Primate's was the speech of the evening, and we may congratulate the Academy on having intrusted the reply to the toast of "The Visitors" to such a speaker. We do not say that Dr. Longley enunciated any new doctrine, or enforced his lesson by any vivid eloquence; there was another hierarch at the board who would probably have been more pictorial about the pictures. But in a day when, without dispute, public taste is much lowered, when anything the criticism is voted either a bore or ill-natured, when success with a great number of persons, however unworthy as judges, is held to imply great merit, when effect is sought for at any price and rewarded with any price, it is exceedingly well that some one, clothed with authority to lecture the great as well as the small, should declare with unfaltering accents, and without a courtly desire to make things pleasant, that the business of art is to look up and not down, and that it is respectable only while it keeps respectable company. We may speak as goodnaturedly as possible of the goodnatured talk of the Premier, who complimented with all his might—veteran cooks are a little liberal with flavour in the sauces—who disinured upon the advantages of being able to study the countenances of young ladies without fear of hurting their feelings or attracting notice from their parents, and who certainly, in the exuberance of his geniality, managed to say something about Landseer's "Blacksmith's Forge" which would not have occurred to most people, for a horse looking as he does likely to kick the animal in that work we have not recently seen. The felicitation upon the improved sculpture-room, the classical joke, and then the classical quotation, were all very well; and, as there are not some sixteen years difference in age between the Academy and the Premier, we hope that he will deliver at least sixteen other speeches at the same board, when (according to Lord Dundreary's calculation) he will be the same age as the institution. Mr. Thackeray's tribute to the artists who work on canvas came gracefully from the most finished of the artists who work on paper; and this was the last noticeable speech of a very gratifying evening.

We have dwelt upon a subject which, under ordinary circumstances, we should have probably noticed only with a report, and for two reasons. One is the interesting fact that the Prince of Wales attended in order to take the earliest opportunity of promising to the Academy that Royal support which is thought to be one of the principal requisites in Trafalgar-square. The other is the more weighty reason, is that the opening of this exhibition is something more than the inauguration of one of the sights of the season. The display, with all its shortcomings, and with all the unfairnesses attributed with more or less justice to those who arrange it, is one of which a refined nation may be justly proud, and to which a moral and religious nation may point. in illustration of the truth that the best intellect works most freely and successfully when it disdains the artifices by which the unconscientious artist seeks to obtain "effect" at the expense of beauty and decorum. Our painters are not only artists but gentlemen, and the result of their labours is an exhibition in which thought has been expended to a noble end. Circumspice.

THE COURT.

The Queen, at the close of last week, accompanied by Prince and Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, the younger members of the Royal family, and attended by the Countess Dowager of Mount-Edgcumbe, Lord Charles Pitzroy, and Major Cowell, left Windsor Castle for Osborne. Her Majesty, who arrived at Gosport at 4 o'clock, the naval and military authorities of the port and garrison, embarked on board the Fairy and crossed the Solent without any salute to denote the Royal presence.

On Sunday the Queen, Princess Louis of Hesse, and the rest of the Royal family attended Divine service at Osborne. The Rev. George Prothero officiated.

On Monday the Queen and Princess Louis of Hesse walked in the grounds, and afterwards, with Prince Louis of Hesse, drove to West Cowes to visit the Prince of Leiningen. His Royal Highness Prince Arthur, attended by Major Elphinstone, left Osborne for Greenwich Park.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louis of Hesse, walked and drove in the vicinity of Osborne. Princesses Helena and Louise rode on horseback.

On Wednesday Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, Prince Alfred, and Princess Helena paid a visit to the dockyard at Portsmouth and to her Majesty's ship Victory. The Fairy arrived from Osborne shortly before 11 o'clock, and the Royal party disembarked and were received by Vice-Admiral Sir Michael Seymour, G.C.B., and Rear-Admiral Superintendent George Elliott. After visiting the Royal Sovereign yacht, the above-named members of the Royal family, this is fitting, the Royal Alfred frigate, and other objects of interest, all of which engaged the attention of the Royal visitors, they were received on board the victory by Vice-Admiral Sir M. Seymour with the usual honours. Their Royal Highnesses returned to the Fairy to East Cowes pier.

The Countess Dowager of Mount-Edgcumbe has succeeded the Countess of Desart as Lady in Waiting to the Queen. Lord Charles Pitzroy and Lieutenant-Colonel Du Plat have succeeded Major-General the Hon. A. Byng and Major-General the Hon. A. Liddell as Equerries in Waiting.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales remain at Marlborough House. The Prince was present at the annual dinner of the Royal Academy on Saturday.

Their Royal Highnesses have visited the Exhibition of the Royal Academy, the Royal Italian Opera (three times), the Queen of Commons, and the Philharmonic Concert at the Hanover-square Rooms during the week.

On Sunday the Prince and Princess attended Divine service in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The Bishop of London, the Dean, and the Sub-Dean officiated.

On Tuesday the Prince and Princess, attended by the Hon. Mrs. Stonor and Major Teesdale, visited the Horticultural Gardens.

Their Royal Highnesses have received during the week at dinner his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, his Royal Highness Prince Louis of Hesse, the Grand Duke, Hereditary Prince Alexander and Henry of Hesse, the Duke and Duchess of Wellington, Earl Granville, Viscount Palmerston, Lord Clarendon, the Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, Viscount and Viscountess Hardinge, Lord Herris, Mr. Gladstone, and Countess of Mount-Edgcumbe, the Earl of St. Germans, Lieutenant-General Knollys, Lieutenant-Colonel Ropsel, &c.

Their Royal Highnesses intend leaving to-day (Saturday) for Cumberland.

Their Grand Ducal Highnesses Prince Alexander and Prince Henry of Hesse left Marlborough House on Saturday morning, on their return to the Continent.

The Duke and Duchess of Wellington have issued cards for a grand banquet on Monday next, at Apsley House, to meet their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales.

The Duke of Argyll has gone to Roseneath Castle, where the Duchess and youthful family are staying. It is understood that the Duke will remain in attendance on the Queen during her Majesty's residence at Balmoral.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn have returned to Chesterfield House from Eastbourne. Her Grace has quite recovered from her recent indisposition.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne and family have arrived at Bowood House from Berkshire.

Field Marshal Viscount Combermere and Viscountess Combermere have arrived in town, from Combermere Abbey, for the season.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Our colleague of the "Sketches in Parliament" knows much better than we can do what will be the legislative fate of the Government Police Amalgamation Bill, and of Mr. Somes's Sunday closing of public-house measure. Both, however, so far as the world at echoes is concerned, are doomed. The City magnates spoke up manfully at their great City meeting at the Guildhall against the centralisation scheme, notwithstanding the attempt to meet them down. Twas not they, Gog and Magog, the "Swordbearer's assistant" and the "Water-bailiff's young man," who protested against Sir George Grey's sweeping enactment. The great City firms—the Crawfords, the Leafs, the Cozzlaines and Moores, the Governor of the Bank of England, and the Archbishop—are all dead against Sir George. And what mortal man—statesman or otherwise—can expect to make head against New Court, St. Swithin's-lane, and Cornhill? It is simply incredible-strong! There are things which it were best to drop, as the Italians did the potato.

We met gallant old George Cruikshank the other day wandering among the ruins of the ancient dominions of the Corporation, hard by the remains of the new Record Hotel. We might have imagined him to be in search of the bones where Mr. Wood, the carpenter, and Mr. Cheere, the sculptor, and where Jack Sheppard is said to have carved his name upon the beam; but, item a sly twinkle in the Cruikshankian eye, we are inclined to hold that the same curious story was "ambisterical," and only a little joke on the part of Mr. Harrison Ainsworth. However, our business with G. C. was not to inquire him for awhile with wonder and admiration, as one must do at this patriarch of the etching needle—was to ask him what he, as a Sabbatical Cockney bachelor, thought of Mr. Somes's Sunday closing bill. We are violating no confidence, we trust, in stating that the staunchest and most ardent advocate of temperance existing—the author of "The Bottle" and "The Drunkard's Children"—does not go as far as Mr. Somes in his repressive views; and, while he thinks some clauses of the bill would do good, is willing to accept a compromise, allowing the public-houses to remain open for an hour in the forenoon, and for an hour in the evening—solely for the benefit of those who desire to take beer with their dinner or supper. At least, it appears there are some moderate men among the teetotallers.

Mr. Cruikshank has lately had the honour to submit his picture of the "Worship of Bacchus" to her Majesty at Windsor and Osborne Castle; and the painting was displayed for the Royal inspection in St. George's Hall. It may not be generally known that Isaac Jan Antoine Cruikshank was an assistant-etcher to the late George Cruikshank's brothers and sisters, and that from his Royal Highness the artist received a commission for his highly-humorous picture of "The Bridle."

There has been lately published by Messrs. Bradbury and Evans one of the most horrible and interesting books we have ever perused, being the journal of an Austrian Secretary of Legation during the reign of Peter the Great, translated from the original quasi diplomatic Latin by Count O'Donnell. We advert to the book for the sake of the pleasant contrast between the Russians of the present day and of the past, by a recent abuse of the Czar Alexander. The "Secretary of Legation" describes with the intense abhorrence of a Pole the "Reign of Terror" of the Strelitz, the unhappy captives, hundreds in number, were tortured, and massacred, or they were hunted, semi-naked, through the streets, and recaptured, and at last beheaded or hanged, while the Czar—the "great" Czar—stood by, drinking brandy and gloating over their agonies. Even one peculiarly abhorrent story of a Polish Envoy, Princess Sophia's waiting-maid, who was scourged into a confession, which, however, did not save her from the supplementary application, just compare these horrors, ye club loungers, with the benevolent document just issued by the Emperor of all the Russias, by which, this corporal punishment is almost entirely abolished. She ladies are to be wholly exempted from a punishment to which it is a scandal to reflect that they should have been ever subjected in Russia. There is to be no more knouting. The atrocious infliction of the nerf-gerse—a thong cut into a multiple lash—whereby, at each stroke the forehead with a red-hot iron—is to be abrogated. Priests and university students are not to be liable to contingent, or ordinary, or the gauntlet in the army, and the mysterious "knekt" in the navy are to be done away with. Only the "minor corporal punishments" are to be retained, and it is these, "minor" as they are, many of which the Russian soldiery, according to the Times' correspondent at Moscow, are at present massed to undergo.

While this pleasing era of humanity is setting in northward, our gallant allies are experimentalising on the best mode of putting animals to death with a minimum amount of pain. It is usually supposed that the mode of decapitation improved by Dr. Guillotin on the old system in the Southern "cradle," the Halifax gibbet, the gibbet, and the Roman machine by means of which Beatrice Cenci was executed, was the one most calculated to produce the least amount of pain and painless death. Dr. Sue, the father of Eugene Sue, the novelist, used to contest this theory and maintain that death, by the guillotine, was comparatively lingering and certainly agonising. This view would seem to be borne out by some experiments lately made on a number of dogs, calves, and sheep, by order of the police of the Paris slaughterhouses. A calf had its head cut off by a butcher's boy, and laid on a table; but the eyeballs rolled in their sockets, appeared to retain sensation. Not only did its tongue protrude and the muscles of the face become convulsed, but the neck was severed, but the pupil of the eye contracted and the lid closed when a finger was held close to it. Experiments with a dog and a sheep gave rise to similar results, and would seem to destroy the theory that the severiation of the spinal marrow at once destroys vitality. The Paris butchers were anxious to adopt the process of killing, but when stricken with a heavy metal bar the ox was often only partially stunned, and required commissaires to be present to prevent the slaughterman. They manage these things better in England. An English Yorkshire butcher is more athletic than a Parisian butcher. With one tremendous blow with a poleaxe he can literally cleave a bullock's skull in twain, and, when a light switch is introduced into the cavity of the brain bounding sensation at once ensues. We, the Americans, with their patent pig-guillotines, say to these experiments.

Mr. T. K. Lord, who travelled as naturalist to the British North American Boundary Commission, and spent years in the wilds, with the rifle, and the axe; and who is described as a cultivated and observant traveller, thoroughly "at home" in the wilderness, has returned to England, with a rich and valuable collection for the British Museum, and is about to embody his remarkable, and at this time most interesting, adventures in popular language, which will be delivered at the Egyptian Hall. Mr. Lord's "At Home in the Wilderness" will be filled up in traveller's style. The audience will peer through a wild and rugged gap in a mountainous pass at a series of pictures of hitherto unknown regions of the West. Mr. Lord is himself to be visible over the gallery, at the back of the platform where he has paddled in the canoe, where he has carried the rifle, where he has shot the axe.

At this same Egyptian Hall that portion of society who have a greater capacity for amusement than appreciation of the ludicrous seem to laugh until their sides ache at the irresistible drollery of Mr. Leland Yates and Mr. Harold Power in their "Twenty Minutes with Spirit-rappers." Unlucky rappers, unfortunate mediums! We are afraid that their little game is very nearly over. Their most dangerous foe has been the late lamented for Mr. Robin. In point of fact, "mediun" nearly as accomplished as Mr. Home, but, more candid than the generality of the fraternity, he never made a secret of how the delusion is carried on. Mr. Bothern's "spirit hand" for tickling the faces of the ladies was merely his own corporeal hand, which he can work out of, and the toes duly provided with rings. By constant exercise his heelship, it is said, acquired such prehensile power that even now, at the age of seventy-one, and despite a comfortable amount of the toilet, he uses his foot and not his hand to pick it up.

"Literary Barnums" have not been such very great rarities in modern times. We have had Sir Egerton Brydges, Sir Robert Ker Porter, and only yesterday we lost Sir George Cornewall Lewis. Then, have we not Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Sir Arthur Hallam Elton, Sir Francis Head, and many more good "Bats" and true who have shown that the blood-red hand is none the worse for being a little stained with ink? Still, a real live Barnum, who is also a real working man or labourer, and lives entirely by his pen, is a decided novelty. Captain Wraxall, the author of innumerable novels, tales, books of travels, and essays, and the translator of Victor Hugo's "Misérables," has, by the demise of an uncle, just succeeded the title rest possessed by the famous author of the "Memoirs," Sir Nathaniel, and is now Sir Lascelles Wraxall, Bart. We observe that an astute publisher has at once seized time by the forelock, and in his advertisement gives the bran new prefix of nobility to the author of "Remarkable Adventurers and Unexplained Mysteries."

We mentioned Sir Francis Head just now. The hearty, go-ahead writer of "Stokers and Pokers," and "Bubbles from the Brunnen of Nassau"—to say nothing of that remarkable war-whoop, A Fortnight of French Exhibitions"—announces a pamphlet with the startling title, "Mr. Kinglake." Is the Crimean campaign to be fought over again, and is Sir Francis Head to undertake the task? Is he to be "order of the day?" The brilliant but caustic author of "Eothen" will have obviously no alternative but to retort by a pamphlet entitled "Mr. Head versus Mr. Kinglake." Unless, indeed, he chooses to go to law. The Battle of Balaclava has got into the Court of Queen's Bench as it is, and the evidence of Lord Cardigan's solicitor, and barrister, is to be debated, apropos of a criminal information against Colonel Yea and Captain Nolan, for libel. It will be long ere "the charge of the Six Hundred" will be as nothing compared with the "charges" which the collectors on either side will make in the way of costs.

THE ROYAL BOX AT COVENT GARDEN ON THE NIGHT OF THE STATE VISIT OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

THE Engraving is a view of the Royal box, with the illustrious occupants, on the evening of the 28th ult. The box is brilliantly decorated and lighted up. The central figures are the Prince and Princess of Wales, seated side by side, the Prince attired in a General's uniform, the Princess in a white silk dress, with a magnificent tiara of diamonds. The other figures in front are Prince Teck, brother of the Princess, and a Lieutenant of the Prince Consort's Rifles. The remaining persons in the box are Countess De Grey, Lady Caroline Barrington, Lord Alfred Paget, Lord Harris, the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, General Knollys, Sir William Hoste, Captain Grey, Mr. Meade, and Major Cowell.

SCENE IN "MASANIELLO," AS PERFORMED AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE annexed Engraving represents the striking scene in the above opera, when, the business and battle of the revolt over, the fisherman Masaniello, having given place to an insurgent gathering, the people are beginning their attack on the barricades thrown up by the Royal troops. Masaniello, meanwhile, having taken their leave after singing the beautiful prayer to the Virgin, pondered doubly pathetic by the plaintive voice of Fenella, who remains in the throng, is seen kneeling on the fee, the stage being already strewed with their dead bodies. As our readers will remember, Covent Garden, on the first night of this opera was heightened by the ingenuity of the stage management.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The Queen has approved of Mr. Alexander Robertson as Consul at Petschar for the King of Hanover.

Lord Hatherley has been appointed her Majesty's High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

Mr. Naylor, chief clerk in the Crown Office, contradicts the statement that he is about to retire, and that Mr. Lewis was elected to Halifax in Nova Scotia, instead of Halifax in Yorkshire.

The Hon. G. E. Lascelles has been duly elected without opposition to the office of Registrar of Deeds for the West Riding. Mr. Dibb, the late holder of the office, has been created a Queen's Counsel.

The Hants Advertiser states that an earthern vessel containing nearly 50 ancient silver and copper coins, has been dug up in a field belonging to Mr. Hall, at Bishop's Waltham, Hants.

Edward O'Neill, Esq., of Shane's Castle, was elected a member of parliament for the county Antrim, on Monday, without opposition, in the room of Major-General Upton, now Lord Templeton.

George Jones, a clerk in the employment of Messrs. Pickford and Co., the carriers, was charged at the Mansion-house with having, as a charge of embezzling a considerable sum of money, the property of his employers. The prisoner was fully committed for trial.

Martha Batten, a prisoner in Reading Gaol, having persisted in refusing to perform the usual prison labour, was ordered to undergo in preparations being made to force nourishment down her throat. She was subsequently found to be dead. Two other female prisoners were on the same goal, she had kept for seventeen days. She was ultimately removed to the lunatic asylum.

A body of Lancashire operatives left Birkenhead in the British Crown, on Saturday last, for Canterbury, New Zealand. These emigrants were furnished with free passages and outfits, granted by the Provincial Government to the Emigration Commissioners in mitigation of the prevailing distress. Applications were received from 1,000 persons, including upwards of 800 single women, and 111 widowers, under the care of Mr. Godley, Mr. Sheppard, and Mr. Cotton, the agents for the Canterbury Association. The number of emigrants who left Liverpool for Canterbury in 1863 was 1,000, and the number who left Liverpool has largely increased during the present year. The number of emigrants who left the United Kingdom in the year 1863 was 176,554, against that of the same month of 1862. In the latter period it was 9611, in the former 20,505. Of the latter number 14,000 were from Ireland, 4,000 from Scotland.

The annual meetings of the Congregational Union of Scotland were this year held in Dundee. They commenced on Wednesday week with fifty-three sermons preached in the various churches of the city, in advance of the Rev. Dr. Alexander. In the evening a conversazione was held in the Albert Institute, at which 1,500 persons were present. On the following morning a public breakfast took place in Union Hall. In the afternoon the Congregational Union of Scotland assembled in the Trades Hall, in Castle Leith, presiding; and the proceedings terminated by a public meeting in Watt Institution Hall, at which addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. Alexander, and addressed some of the meetings, and the whole proceedings went off with the greatest éclat. The Rev. Dr. Alexander, in the chair, stated that there was not a paid pregnon, and the various addresses, though not excellent, were in a high degree interesting and instructive.

For several weeks past the Roman Catholic chapel in Union-road, Cambridge, has been the scene of great excitement, in consequence of undergraduate members of the University, evidently acting in concert, have taken to the habit of entering the chapel during service and creating a disturbance by laughing carelessly, mounting long clay pipes, and other unseemly conduct. On Sunday last, the Rev. Father Lescher, the officiating clergyman, in his open several occasions, but without effect, and last Sunday evening they assembled in greater numbers than previously, and, after the service commenced took the ringleaders into custody. The Proctors ballot out the offenders. On Monday, at the Mayor's Court, E. S. Worsley, Esq., M.A., was summoned before the local magistrates, and were sentenced to seven days' imprisonment, without hard labour. Mr. Bateson, of Trinity, was fined £1 for assisting the police outside the chapel.

Dr. Edward Frankland, F.R.S., was unanimously elected Professor of Chemistry in the Royal Institution at the general monthly meeting of the managers on Monday.

The Correspondencia of Madrid of the 1st states positively that Queen Isabella will abdicate in favour of her son, the young prince Isabella, her recognised heir as his Sovereign, and councillor, for himself and his successors, in the event of their minority.

The Grenada Court of Appeal has just sentenced Matamoros, the Spanish Protestant, to nine years of heavy imprisonment for offences against religion, and another of the number to seven years' imprisonment with deprivation of civil rights.

The loyalty of the people and loyalty of the British provinces of America, it is worth recording that the Corporation of Halifax sent the Mayor and twelve aldermen to express congratulations on the Prince and Princess of Wales upon their marriage.

The Duke of Brunswick's wolf-hunting in Poitou was brought to a close last week by a brilliant run of seven leagues, when the wolf was taken at the entrance of the grand gate of the château of Chasseneuil, the residence of the Prince and his sporting friends. The Duke's wolf-hounds, which are very highly of the Duke's breeds, and are of opinion that if they had been brought over at the opening of the season excellent results would have been obtained.

The invention of postage-stamps (says the Mondo) is far from being so modern as is generally supposed. A postal regulation in France of the year 1653, which has recently come to light, gives notice of the creation of a post called "Billets de port payé," and the annexed engraved sketch represent of the Prince says that sporting men think very highly of the Duke's hounds, and are of opinion that if they had been brought over at the opening of the season excellent results would have been obtained.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

"Let 56," chalked upon the front of No. 145, Cheapside, dwelt the Saddlers' Company are about to lease the entire to the three Great Hall. The large and boldly-sculptured arms, with their saddles, and saddled and bridled horses, will, doubtless, be preserved. We never pass this half-front without thinking of Sir Richard Baldeaves, schoolmaster, physician, and small poet; "the Chaspaide Knight," and "the City Bard." "The merry pedestrian," who wrote poems recited at Saddlers' Hall, and to whom Garth said,

"Thy lines are worse and sooner live not long.

Nor can we forget Tom Brown's epigram —

To Sir E—— B——, on the two Wooden Horses before Saddlers' Hall.

Two knights of one trade, and two horses of one stock,
To place before thy door a brace of nits.

Whether Sir Richard lived at the hill, or in a house adjoining, has never been clearly ascertained.

The western half of the Guildhall has been filled with scaffolding for the purpose of placing over the great west window roof an ancient Bard. Sir Christopher Wren's anomalous but and square-panelled ceiling will be left as it is, and it must be allowed that it is an evidence of the better appreciation of art in the present than in the last century.

Mr. Peter Cunningham, in his notices of British authors, in the Builder of last week, records the present of a chain and medal to Hubert Le Sueur by King Charles I. In the warrant-book of the King's Lord Chamberlain, Philip Herbert, Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, is the following entry :—"28th January, 1633-3.—A warrant for a chain and a medal of eighty pounds value, a free gift unto Hubt. Le Sueur." "This," adds Mr. Cunningham, "is a new fact now first published in the life of that great patron of art and artist, the neatyr-menarch."

Every visitor to stately Oxford must regret the state of much of the stonework of its public edifices. The portico of St. Mary's Church is a sad instance of decay, and we are glad to see that its restoration is proposed. Mr. Scott suggests that the purpose the substitution of the stone by some indurating solution in the first instance, as it is as to render it safe at present. Mr. Richmond, Mr. Buck, and Mr. Street, "after this," says Mr. Scott, "we could proceed more safely in cutting out the most decayed portions and replacing them." The porch was erected in 1637.

Under the provisions of the Union Benefices Act, it is proposed to which also serves for the Lombard Church, Aldersgate, which at present most inconveniently narrows the entrance to Fenchurch-street from Leadenhall-street and Gracechurch-street, and which also serves for the Lombard Church, Aldersgate, is about 150 ft. from the church of Aithallows, Lombard-street, and the population of the three parishes is only 1,200. Saint Mary Woolnoth and Saint Mary Aldwhich has accommodation. It is also proposed to make a new district in Bermondsey, to be called Saint Bunel's, Stepney." In above united parishes to contribute £100 per annum towards the endowment; and the clock, bells, and furniture of the church of St. Mary Woolnoth are to be removed to the new church at Stepney. St. Benet's, Gracechurch-street, is one of Wren's least attractive edifices, rebuilt after the Great Fire. The old parish registers commence 1538. "Benedict, Gracechurch," in a survey made in the twelfth century; according to Stow, was called Grass-church, to distinguish it from other churches of the same name, because that the herb-market was held opposite its western door. Weever records that on the monument of early date (1491) in the church; but the parish books contain many curious entries. Thus, at the accession of Queen Mary, in 1553—"Paid to the Clarkes and Singing men for their pains to such Scriptures as in the tyme of King Edward VI. were written in Latin, and by the Quene's Majestie's comandement, now by v. Right Hon. y^e lord bishopp of Winchester, L^d Chanc^r of England, &c. &c.," and "Paid to the poppettes for the pashing y^e Boyes with Mary and John, 6d." while in the first year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, 1558, occur, "Payd to a carpetter for pulling down of the rood and Mary, xx^d." and "Paid three labourers one day for pulling down the altars and John, 2s. 6d." A pair of organs was sold "the somme of xxxiiij^li. 6s. 8d." with a pruned ceiling, crossed by bands. There is an oak altar-p^s, with pictures of Moses and Aaron, painted upon it.

The case of Eliza Fenning is frequently referred to in proof of the fallibility of circumstantial evidence. More than one confession of the innocence of the poor girl of the crime for which she suffered have appeared. The following is from the privately-printed catalogue of Mr. Wilson's collection, recently referred to in our Journal; and the particulars were communicated by one acquainted with Mr. Fenning's family:—"If any confirmation were wanting to Mr. Wilson, "she was as guiltless of the crime for which she suffered as any reader can be, the following circumstance will prove that it was afforded. At length, however, Truth, the daughter of Time, unveiled the mystery. On a bed in a room divided by Cheltenham, in Essex, lay a man in the throes of death, and a female relative hovered with inward agony. To those surrounding that bed and watching his fearful exit from the body, he confessed, for the sake of the peace of a Mr. Turner, of Chancery-lane; that, many years since, intrusted with a sum of money, he had robbed his employer, and, not content with the money, he availed himself of the absence for a few minutes of the servant-maid from the kitchen, where the fire and deposited a quantity of powdered arsenic on some dough he found mixed in a pan. Eliza Fenning, he added, was wholly ignorant of these facts." He died, and was buried. I will not presume to carry the parallel further."

The Malt Tax being now in debate, it may be interesting to know that, in ancient times, it was usual for the lords of manors to build service of the poorer tenants in the immediate neighbourhood of a monastery, as at Darent and other places near Rochester, and at Battle. Tenants of the manor of Sandwich, as far back as 800, are bound, paid a tax called Malt Silver. The cottagers carried their malt to the lord's mill to be ground, for they were not allowed to keep hand-mills or mortars, which might be used in grinding corn. The malt might be ground by the lord's servants or labourers; but in some manors the lord had a public kiln, which the tenants were bound to make use of. (Lees' Magazine.)

We are reminded by a correspondent that book others formerly used tokens, although they were lately stated by Mr. Duvall to be his discovery. At Ely, for instance, we find the tokens of Mr. Sheares, bookseller, at the "Bible," in Bedford-street, Covent-garden. "O. Pease Bell, Bookseller," and "Mr. Bell's Shop, 1796—W8." Janes Lechington, of Finsbury-square, who retired from business in 1798, had his token.

The Rev. W. Bazeley, of Bristol, 10th ult. gave to the Archæological Institute an interesting account of excavations and restorations which have been going on for some time past at Bradenstoke, under the the direction of the Duke of Buccleuch. All the foundations of the abbey church, upwards of 300 ft. in length, have been laid bare and traced; and the position of every buttress and pillar discovered. Many lead coffins have been found on the site of the church; and, during excavations made some years since, the bones of a king were found under the choir, the remains of a female wrapt in lead were discovered in the chapter-house, and, after the lapse of many years, Isabella, daughter of the Earl of Pembroke, and wife of Richard, Earl of Cornwall, better known as King of the Romans, and brother of King Henry III. She was buried at Beaulieu, with great pomp, in 1239; and an inscribed stone, with the effigy of a female much defaced, has lately been discovered, bearing this inscription :—"[HIC] JACET ISABELLA COMITISSA [CORN]WALL." On the reverse of the stone may be faintly traced—[HENRICUS] REX ROMANORUM. Some interesting discoveries were made in the silver crown with which the King of the Romans was crowned. It is now at Aix-la-Chapelle; and it appears from the proceedings of Dr. Bock, a German, whom the Emperor of Austria has commissioned to examine the Imperial archives, that the crown was made in Europe and by English workmen, and was carried to Germany by the Duke of Cornwall to be used in his coronation. The same silver crown was afterwards used in crowning the Emperors of Germany, who were crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, first with the iron crown, then with the silver crown, and afterwards with the golden crown given by the Pope. Dr. Bock cited instances to prove that English workmen were generally employed for the execution of the choicest works in the mediæval period.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

A LITTLE time ago, when persons were somewhat bashfulness about the prospect of a boardman Session, we ventured to insinuate that we had faith in Mr. Gladstone's power of getting up that sort of interest which is derived from antagonism, in the House of Commons. We did not reckon upon Sir George Grey, and, indeed, he did not enter into our calculations at all; but, with a certain forcible feebleness which belongs to him, he has contrived to provide a couple of knotties or so, and hot water for the Session. If it were not for Lord Palmerston's taste for, and capability of, acting as a Parliamentary fire-annihilator, the House might become as hot as we pray we could wish it to be; but the Premier does not desire that it should be too hot to hold him in his present position; so he extinguishes all conflagrations in the nearest basin. When a temperate Liberal lives expressed in various ways its approbation of the Budget a fortnight ago, the Irish press incorporated that an equally great House would assemble to behold Mr. Gladstone go through the humiliating operation of eating a financial leek. Everybody knows that any of the flat tax or income tax, which created such a monster opposition that a Chancellor of the Exchequer could not get into his own room to meet a deputation, has been taken up with favour by the Conservative Bishops, PEEL, M.P.'s, and vested interests personified in every shape. Most people will remember that Mr. Lowe had the Duke of Buckingham's boots mobbed out of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's hands; and no one could have been surprised at the deadly pallor of the latter, the storm-haze of his brow, his ghastly attempts at smiles, and his palpable efforts to appear cool and unconcerned. When Lord Palmerston came in he set himself next to Mr. Gladstone, and entered into such apparently merry conversation with him; and one could not help fancying that, as he leaned over, the First Minister of the Crown whispered Mr. Gladstone really objected to the flavour of leeks, and assuring him that when he became accustomed to them as he, Mr. Gladstone, was from eating them two or three times a week this Session, their pungency and disagreeable flavour would be found more fanciful than real; while if those parties who objected to the onion state—worthy self-confidence there could be no doubt in the world.

Now, we must not be understood to breathe a word of disloyalty if we say that it was almost cruel of the Prince and Princess of Wales to select the particular occasion they did upon which they should be a tribute to Mr. Gladstone's genius. One thought he grew even paler than before, and he certainly looked more grim when it became known that the Princess of Wales was in the Royal Gallery and when the Prince seated himself in the diplomatic gallery. What their Royal Highnesses thought of the performance of Lord Robert Montagu "whose on "count out" has never been forgotten by him) on the "e" and the "i" of the pronunciation of "Reform," and how much must have watched the time they could give to the House before dining and getting to the Philharmonic at eight o'clock, to hear Mr. James Stansfeld's speech, and Mr. Cogman's, and Mr. Gladstone for half an hour, it is not easy to say. At length the eventful moment came, and Mr. Gladstone, with his face like a flint, as Mr. Tom Kinglake would say, rose, and with unnatural calmness proceeded to deliver, at the request of Government, the greatest speech that was ever uttered in Parliament. If the Prince of Wales could have stayed longer than twenty minutes after that speech, he would have been a witness to a rhetorical feat of which no other man living is capable. Conceive a Chancellor of the Exchequer, funestly pressed with the bold and startling figures of the accumulation of those, which took the shape of a virtue which springs from one of the most wonderful sources of the human heart, and erroneously, as we think, supposing that he was striking at the slave by taxing a "luxury," and short by an enormous sum, and actually having to come down to the House to give up the most darling part of his financial scheme, and oh, worst of all, with it just half of that surplus which he had announced in exultation to the House and to all comers. He did not part with it, however, without such a crushing denunciation of the force which he could not resist, that it was for ever to be its knell; and as for ingenuity in illustration and power of language in holding it up to scorn and derision the subject matter of the proposition, none but himself could have been his parallel. As to giving up his scheme, he did nothing of the kind; he hurled it at his opponents with the force and fire and fury of a Titan in his strength.

What a contrast was presented when he sat down, and poor Sir Stafford Northcote, with his hopeful countenance, by no means to be deemed by a redundancy of hair and beard and a certain prominency of spectacles, found himself into an attempt at a reply to what was a crushing, but which reminded one of that of General Tom Thumb when he persuaded Alexander the Great. Not that Sir Stafford did not make good points, and put them well, but no one could one cannot get over the notion of his being the incarnation of a compulsive examination. Lord Harry Vane holds a good position in the House of Commons. He is a kind of pilot-balloon to his party. Rarely present to himself to his House, his appearance is the indicative of danger; and when he pronounces against any plan of the Government every one knows that there is an end of it. Whence he derives this influence, or on what it is founded, no one can say; but the fact is certain; and when on this occasion he told Ministers that he should vote against it, it needed not that Lord Derby should have shown out his rhetorical surrentle, or that Mr. Henley should, in somewhat inaudible manner, accuse Mr. Gladstone of slapping his pocket, entitled him to any honours which might be accorded to Mammon, or any other chary task to finish the affair. By the debate dropped suddenly, and Mr. Gladstone, in a few words and with a certain expression of countenance, announced the withdrawal of his proposition. Mr. Disraeli, with a forced calmness, announced on financial matters that Mr. Gladstone, and who had been, as usual, quiescent and nearly motionless all the evening, merely paying his respects to Ministers, for him, high compliment of turning slightly towards him when he was speaking, rose with the leap of a tiger, and every one expected a burst of the old philippic style which has him with it, such as it is. But nothing of the sort came. The first sentence was wild enough, but the rest was all the first sentence came, and diluted and weakened by repetition; and perhaps the only real conclusion to be drawn from the whole affair was the very poverty of that attempt at giving a kick when he was down.

Of course it has been the event of the last few days; but there has been much doing, and much might be said or sung of those doings. One might tell how the great Church Rate debate began with exactly seven hundred members in the House, and how amidst the clamorous shoutings of five hundred and fifty. One might also speak of the drill episode which was to be the "feature" that curious, whambling, busy, apparently half-witted, but really wide-awake, half-cynical, independent member, Mr. Hardy, how has got a specialty for managing matters relating to the extension of the suffrage, so as to favour the progress of Conservatism; how he has added a new item to the list of the "ologies" and talked of breach of faith, it was amusing to hear Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen indignantly protest against his having been ill-treated in his character of party whipper-in to the Government, by the drill; how the drill was the wild rush in of Mr. Collins, and his humorous efforts to talk against time, which he continued for about a quarter of an hour, while all the clubs, opera houses, and balls were being ransacked for Opposition men to be had in vain, for at length a division was forced on, and the bill squeezed out of existence for this year.

A still more curious and more interesting debate was that in which Mr. Walter and Mr. Lowe appeared as deadly opponents on a question of detail of national education. The point of the matter lay in the supposed inconsistency which the latter gentleman was charged with in their respective characters of proprietor and cherished contributor to a great public journal; but the duel was watched with a deep interest and amusement. Mr. Walter came down with a hundred thousand power of documentary argument, slightly relieved by a certain acrimony of style when he was delivering his own thoughts and language; and if an adversary could have been crushed by mere weight there would have been nothing left but a very flat residuum of the Vice-President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education; we profess a liking for the Germanised official designation. But the elasticity of Mr. Lowe was proof against it. Whether it was that he unwittingly felt the influence of that Anglo-Saxonism which will be inseparable from the relation of employed and employer, or whether he wished to show a grand spirit of independence, certain it is that even he never displayed in greater profusion his powers of insolence and sarcasm. He spoke no speech in the strict sense of the term; he used no gesture, but stood nearly still, with his arms hanging beside him; and he slipped out, in a quiet, unconstrained, nonchalant manner, a series of sharp sentences, which can only be characterised as pungent, incisive talk. If he could have been allowed to sit in an easy chair and cross one knee over the other, he would have done it. Nothing could be less like the Mr. Lowe of former days than his manner was unapproachable by any one now in the House, or, at least, no one ever seemed to attempt it. Certainly he is quality in addressing us assembly that is not to be disguised at the best.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Royal assent was given by commission to several bills.

A long discussion arose on the question raised by Lord Chelmsford that the Abbot Jerring, of Westminster, had no right to nomination for that purpose was negatived by 60 votes to 29.

The Clergy Discipline Bill and the Vice-Admiralty Courts Bill passed through Committee.

Mr. Lygon's Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Lords' amendments to the Local Government Act (1863) Amendment Bill were considered and agreed to.

The House, in Committee, passed the clauses of the Savings Banks Bill, after discussion, with unimportant changes.

The Royal Medical Supplemental Fund Society Winding-up Act Amendment Bill, the Courts of the Church of England Bill, and the Wellington Statue (Ireland) Bill were read a second time.

The Customs (Ireland) Bill, the Exchequer Bonds Bill, and the Marriages, &c. (Ireland), Bill were read a third time and passed.

Mr. Layard, in reply to a question put by Mr. Hadfield, explained a transaction in the Island of Salamora. That island had been given by the Imaum of Muscat to the Government of India, and the Majesty's ship Pluto had been sent there and burned the United States' flag flying. A full inquiry was taken and the correspondence would be laid before Parliament. There had been correspondence with the Imaum of Muscat, but not with the Government.

In reply to Sir J. Duke, explained the position of the Police Magistrates of the Metropolis, and said that the Government did not intend that these orders had not been complied with, and the matter had been referred to the Standing Committee on Police Magistrates for their decision.

The "NO HOUSE" ON FRIDAY.—Lord E. MONTAGU complained that no House was made on Friday, by which the time of the House was wasted to make sad keep a House on that day, by which the Government were allowed to postpone their business to Friday instead of Friday.—Mr. D. GRIFFITH hoped that there would be no substitute attempted as to the "no House" being an accident. He had been told that the Lord Advocate, Mr. Lowe, and the Secretary to the Treasury and two of his satellites, who were at hand, had come in, there was a sufficient number to form a House, but the sick, and not the omission, of the Government.—Mr. R. COCHRANE wished it to be understood that there was no Government Organ of the Press in Ireland.—Lord PALMERSTON said he was sorry the House was not made, for as to the motions which the hon. gentleman had given notice of, he thought it probable that those motions should have come on and been disposed of by the preponderance of arguments on the side of the Government. He thought that there was certainly an understanding that a House should always be made on Friday; but the "no House" on Friday was frequently brought on to the sick of the Government. Care would be taken, so far as Government was concerned, to prevent such a thing occurring in future.—Mr. DISRAELI said that, as to the occurrence on Friday, he thought it a violation of a compact with the House that such a thing should occur again.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE.—INCOME TAX ON CHARITIES.

The House then gone into Committee of Ways and Means, and Mr. Ralph Bernal Osborne, Bart., moved a resolution, declaring that the income tax upon trades, professions, and employments ought to be repealed.

On clause 2, by which it was proposed to charge charitable institutions with the tax, Mr. Gladstone said that the Government had no objection to the motion which he wished to raise was whether the law should be changed which gave exemption to charitable bequests. He thought that the House was not quite when grounds that special exemption was to be made, although he was quite prepared to admit that there were cases in which a special claim was found which were disposed of in the shape of salary. He was prepared to say that charities connected with the Established Church were not free from all exemption from double-bed bequests. The income of the country, as gathered from the income-tax returns, amounted to about 300 millions a year, and of that three millions belonged to charities. These charities he divided into three classes—the small, the middle, and the large. The small were those of 500 a year, and the middle those of £500 a year, and which it was proposed should be taxed at £165 a year. The persons who managed the small charities were generally unpaid, and were supported by the present scheme of the Government to remit taxation in favour of the small charities. Then came the large charities, of which Greenwich Hospital was an apt illustration of the great charities. It enjoyed public munificence to the amount of £2,000 a year, and its income in 1867 was £70,000. It was originally intended for "sick, sore, and destitute children;" but such was not the case now. It now received the full allowing principle. On the contrary, the present inmates were the children of persons with incomes from £200 to £400 a year. The number in the establishment was 1,000, and it received a vested interest in 1600 presentations. It had been urged that if charities were taxed they would be compelled to increase the number of the Bartholomew's Hospital alone. The revenue of that hospital was £80,000 a year, and it was administered by a staff of officers, the head of whom was the treasurer, who received £2,000 a year. The House, however, would see that a partial return for the advantages which the income in question derived from the public purse. Another charity of which hon. gentleman observed that the Government did not wish to press the measure in any spirit of hostility to the charities, but to defer to its opinion; but in doing so, they reserved to themselves the power of considering in what way the subject could be dealt with hereafter, so as to deal with the question as it might be disposed to accept it; but they did press it on the House as a measure that would be found to extend to certain charitable institutions which hitherto had unfairly governed the proceedings of Parliament for more than twenty years past, as well as to the general administration of the country, the full allowing principle for the elevation of their character as well as the improvement of their condition; which principle was the principle of justice, of truth, of equity, of courage, and the wisdom of the House of Commons.

Mr. Gladstone then moved to close, however, the proposition to tax charities, and clause 4, relating to the same subject, were negatived without a division.

The other clauses and the schedules were agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Vice-Admiralty Courts Bill was read with amendments, and several private measures were advanced a stage. The other business was unimportant.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Bill as amended was considered and agreed to, and ordered to be read a third time.

Leave was given to the Marquis of Hartington to bring in a bill to consolidate and amend the Militia Laws (Ireland).

On the motion of Mr. F. Peel, leave was given to introduce a bill to enable local authorities to provide harbours of refuge for fishing and other small craft in Ireland.

On the motion of Mr. Caird, leave was given to introduce a bill to extend the Sheriffs' small debt jurisdiction in Scotland.

The Derby Regattas (Ireland) Bill was withdrawn.

The Jurors' Remuneration Bill was passed through Committee.

The Universities of Scotland Bill was read a second time, explained by Mr. WALPOLE, who moved a couple of resolutions. They were to the effect that the endowments of the universities of Scotland ought to be applied throughout the country in which the attendance and examination of the children came up to the requirements of the Government, and that the fees for the payment of certificated and pupil teachers an indispensable condition for the payment of grants to the universities. Sir W. DUNBAR opposed the bill, which was seconded by Mr. CRAUFURD. Lord ELCHO opposed it. Mr. MONCREIFF supported the measure, because the state of the universities and the resolutions were not to be pressed to a division. Mr. GLADSTONE said the question had been dealt with. He commended that it would be undesirable to legislate on the subject during the session; but he thought they could well be acted upon.—After a long debate the first resolution was withdrawn, and the second was agreed to on a division by 117 to 117.

THE ACT OF UNIFORMITY.—Mr. E. DENTON asked for leave to go into Committee on the bill to amend the Act of the 13th and 14th of Car. II. c. 4, for Uniformity, by which all parsons, curates, and fellows of colleges were required to declare their unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and to make such subscription.—Mr. URQUHART and Lord STANLEY supported the motion, which was opposed by Sir W. HEATHCOTE and Lord R. CECIL, who moved the adjournment of the debate.—Lord PALMERSTON thought the matter one which required consideration, and he was disposed to assist in the distinction taken by Mr. Walpole. He was of opinion that the bill might be allowed to be read a first time, and he would be prepared to assist in further proceed with.—The motion for adjourning the debate was withdrawn, and the bill was then taken into Committee, and the House went into Committee, which was carried by 157 to 135.—Leave was given to bring in the bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Marriages Registration (Ireland) Bill, introduced by Mr. Maxwell, and the Admiralty Court (Ireland) Bill were respectively read a second time.

The House had two church-rate bills before it. One was introduced by Mr. Newdegate, and had for its object the enumeration of church rates by the imposition of a charge upon property. After a debate it was negatived by 151 votes to 56. The second bill was brought forward by Mr. Alcock, and proposed to enable persons to redeem church rates in the same way as the land tax is now redeemed. It also was negatived by a majority of 72.

The House went into Committee on the Scarcity from Violence Bill, which seeks to introduce flogging as a punishment in cases of crimes of violence. A long fight took place on the clauses, but eventually the bill passed through Committee.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL.—Before the House went into Committee on this bill Earl RUSSELL moved its committal, and explained that one of the chief points in the bill was to prevent the purchase of a borough for five years. The bill also imposed stringent penalties upon any voter who accepted a bribe, and rendered him incapable of voting. The last of DERBY took exception to the clause suspending the borough for five years.—Lord CHELMSFORD said he thought the penalties of the bill struck out.—After a short discussion the House went into Committee.—Clause 1 was agreed to.—Lord DERBY moved that the case should be heard at the bar, and that the Lords should be summoned for that purpose.—Mr. WALPOLE asked the Under Secretary of State for War when the military survey of the environs of London, started in the beginning of 1865, was likely to be completed for publication at the end of last year, is likely to be issued?—The MARQUIS of HARTINGTON said that he hoped to be able to say by the end of the year.

THE EXHIBITION BUILDING.

Lord R. CECIL asked the First Commissioner of Works whether the report is true that the Government have offered or intend to become purchasers of the Exhibition building in which the Paris Exhibition was contained; and, if so, what they propose to pay for it, and at what period of the Session they intend to bring forward the estimate.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he was not at present able to answer the question of the noble Lord, which seems the notice of which the Government intended to purchase the building early information would be given to the House, as the Government had no intention of doing so.

CARLTON TERRACE.—Sir J. SHELLEY asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government had been made the Commissioners of Woods and Forests by a sworn surveyor of the value of the site of the stables lately pulled down at the east end of Carlton-terrace, and whether the Government intend to build upon the site was in the market, in order to ascertain what value the public would be subjected to in the purchase of the ground; and whether there will be no objection to produce a copy of any such report, together with the lease of the site as granted to the late Duke of Buckingham.—Mr. T. G. BARING and Mr. PEEL said that the valuation was made in the usual way, and the sum of £150 a year was fixed. The communications had been made for the site, and after many of those applications had been refused the site was let. There would be no objection to produce the papers moved for.

PRISONS MINISTERS BILL.—On the order for going into Committee on this bill, Mr. Hardy, on the part of the Government, that the House go into committee on the bill that day six months.—After a long discussion, the amendment was carried by a majority of 10 votes.—The House went into Committee upon the bill.—Upon the first clause, Mr. Hardy moved that the chairman report progress upon the first clause of the bill. A lengthened discussion followed, which ended by a division of 86 against 84 in favour of the motion, and the House at seven o'clock resumed the consideration of the Committee up to nine midnight.

THE DISTRESS IN THE NORTH

THE returns from the local relief committees in the cotton-manufacturing districts show that in the week ending April 25, as compared with the week in March, there was an increase of 21,816 in the number of operatives fully employed, and of 11,761 in the number working short time. On the other hand, while the number of persons wholly out of employment was less by 14,956, there was an increase of 16,921 in the number relieved from the commencement of the year. The number, large as it is, is 61,007 below the return for March. Mr. Purnell's weekly report shows a decrease of 1,178 in the number in receipt of medical relief. Several grants were made.

Yesterday the Manchester Cotton Famine Relief held their weekly meeting. The subscriptions to the fund during last week amounted to above £2165, of which £1000 came from Australia and £100 from Canada. The number and amount of money amounting to £1795, for distribution by local relief committees, the largest grant being £200 to Ashton.

The distressed operatives of Hinckley have been behaving themselves admirably, in consequence of the liberality in the amount of relief given them. There have, however, been no breaches of the peace.

The Richmond Inquirer says the stars and bars have gone out of use by general consent as the Confederate flag, because of its too great resemblance to the Stars and Stripes. The ordnance bureau has, with a St. Andrew's cross of blue, is in general use in the Confederate armies.

Mr. Charles W. Glover, the composer of many popular songs, died a few days ago. Mr. Glover was a native artist of the name, with a "Jeanette and Jeanie" to the publisher, and that its sale produced £3000.

SCENE AT ST. PETERSBURG.—The following description of the breaking up of the ice on the Neva:—"Yesterday the ice on the Neva suddenly began to move, and in about half an hour the bridge of boats traverses St. Petersburg. It was not expected to take place for a week or ten days, and the ice was consequently not thick in many places. The blocks of ice crashed and burst as soldiers that there is not enough ice left for the usual fête. The bridge was swept away to the extremity of the Litenaia. THE FARM.

THE council of the Royal Agricultural Society, after a long and close debate on Wednesday, decided to hold their meeting for next year at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

In Dumfriesshire, and throughout all the south of Scotland, the lambing season has most favourable, and, in fact, there have seldom been finer lambs. Owing to the fine open winter the hill stock has been peculiarly healthy and escaped the rot, which has been rather prevalent in the flat districts, and the rate rather less than the rather prevalent in the flat districts, and the rate rather less than the exception in Ayrshire, where the rain has been sixty inches already this year. The grass-lettings have, on the whole, been very high this year. The grass-lettings have, on the whole, been very high this year. The grass-lettings have, on the whole, been very high

MRS. ANN PERRIAM.

THERE can be but very few spectators, and still fewer actors, left of the events in which Mrs. Ann Perriam, whose Portrait we this week engrave, took a busy part. Aged ninety-three, she was a married woman in the year 1793, a date anterior to that in which some great-grandfathers among us first saw the light of day. At that time her husband, Edward Hopping, was serving as a seaman on board H.M.S. Crescent, commanded by Captain Sir James Saumarez. Upon the ship putting into Plymouth for repairs after a long cruise on the coast of France, she proceeded thither to meet her husband, and, at his request, was allowed to accompany him to sea. At that time a certain number of women of good character were allowed to sail with their husbands. Upon Sir James Saumarez' subsequent removal to the Orion, Hopping and his wife followed him. Mrs. Perriam served on board the latter ship five years, and during that time witnessed and bore her part in, besides many minor engagements, the following great naval battles:—At L'Orient, on the 23rd of June, 1795; off Cape St. Vincent, on the 14th of February, 1797; and at the glorious battle of the Nile, won by Nelson on the 1st of August, 1798. Mrs. Perriam's occupation while in action lay with the gunners and magazine men, among whom she worked, preparing flannel cartridges for the great guns. Her recollection of the share which she took in these great events is still vivid, and at the advanced age of ninety-three the veteran heroine can recall with pride and interest, incidents of the hard-won fights in which she discharged a man's—more than a woman's—part. It may be mentioned that her brother fought also in the same ship, with twelve other young men from Exmouth, her native place, who volunteered especially for service under Sir James Saumarez, one of whom died an Admiral. Of this number Ann Perriam is the sole survivor. Indeed, the number of those alive who fought at St. Vincent or the Nile can be very few now.

After the loss of her second husband Ann Perriam maintained herself honestly by selling fish in the streets of Exmouth. In her eightieth year increasing debility compelled her to discontinue that occupation. Having outlived all her friends and children, and possessing but scanty means in her declining years, she is not surrounded by those comforts which her busy life and strange services should have secured her.

ANN PERRIAM, OF EXMOUTH, AGED 93.

THE ALEXANDRA.

THROUGH the courtesy of Mr. William Woods, of Queen's-road, Liverpool, we are enabled to give an Illustration of the Alexandra, recently seized at Liverpool by order of the Government on suspicion that she was intended for the use of the Confederates. The Alexandra was built by Messrs. Miller and Co., of Liverpool, for Messrs. Fawcett, Prescott, and Co., of the same town, both firms being of long standing and great respectability. She was built, launched, and fitted out in dock, when, on the 5th ult., a custom-house officer went on board, and gave a notice to the following effect:—"I have herewith to inform you that, pursuant to the directions of the Collector of Customs, the vessel Alexandra, built by you, has been seized, and will be detained until further instructions shall be received as to the course to be pursued with respect to her." The Alexandra is a three-masted schooner, with engines of 300-horse power, and is adapted for a passenger-vessel, a mail-boat, or a yacht. The firm to which she belongs state that, having heard many inquiries for a vessel of that description, they built her on speculation.

We learn from the Liverpool papers that at the close of last week one or two Government officials were busily engaged in completing the evidence to be adduced by the Crown in the prosecution of the case against the builders and owners of the alleged gun-boat Alexandra. It is also asserted that the parties suing the depositions to the Government, in which it was stated that the Alexandra was intended for the Confederates, have received notices from the law officers of the Crown intimating that they will be required in London at an early period. According to the Shipping Gazette, the case of the Alexandra will be tried in the Court of Exchequer on the course of a few days. The following is the cause of seizure stated in the appraisement filed in the Court of Exchequer:—"No. 1. Date, 1863. Seized by officer Edward Morgan. Cause of seizure: For being equipped, furnished, and fitted out with intent to be employed in the service of persons exercising, or assuming to exercise, the powers of self-government in and over a foreign State, colony, province, or people, the said vessel, Alexandra, of Liverpool, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, as she now lies.—Signed, Samuel Price Edwards, John King, C. W. Kellock, H. B. Watson." The Alexandra is appraised at £9000.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON.

THE Right Hon. George Frederick Samuel Robinson, Earl De Grey, of Wrest, in the county of Bedford, and Earl of Ripon, in the county of York, Viscount Goderich, of Nocton, Baron Grantham, of Grantham, in the county of Lincoln, and a Baronet, was born the 24th of October, 1827, about the time when his father, the first Earl of Ripon, and then Viscount Goderich, was Prime Minister. He was the only son of the Earl, by the only daughter and heiress of the fourth Earl of Buckinghamshire. He succeeded to his father's titles as Earl of Ripon and Viscount Goderich on the 28th of January, 1859; to those of his uncle, as Earl De Grey and Baron Grantham, and to the baronetcy on the 14th of November, 1859. The late Earl De Grey was the brother of the first Earl of Ripon, and changed his name in the first instance to Weddell, and afterwards assumed the name, arms, and title of his aunt, Lady Amabel Hume Campbell, great-grand-daughter of Henry Grey, twelfth Earl of Kent, and first Baron Lucas, who was created in 1706 Viscount Goderich and Marquis of Kent, and in 1710 raised to the dignity of Duke of Kent. The Duke had by his first marriage four sons and seven daughters, all of whom died in his lifetime, without issue, except one daughter, Amabel, who married Viscount Glenorchy, son of the Earl of Breadalbane, who died in 1727, leaving an only daughter, Jemima. The Duke by a second marriage had a son, who died in his infancy, and a daughter, who married John Egerton, Bishop of Durham. The Duke obtained a new patent creating him Marquis De Grey, with remainder to his granddaughter, Jemima Campbell, daughter of his eldest daughter, Lady Amabel, wife of Lord Glenorchy above mentioned. On the Duke's death all his titles, except the marquisate of De Grey and the barony of Lucas, became extinct, and these devolved on the aforesaid lady Jemima Campbell, his granddaughter, then Lady Jemima Boyston, having married, a few days before her father's death, Philip, Viscount Royston, eldest son of the first Earl of Hardwicke, by whom she had two daughters only—Amabel, who succeed her in the Barony of Lucas, and Mary Jemima, married to Thomas, second Lord Grantham, who left two sons—Thomas Philip, who succeeded his father as third Lord Grantham, and Frederick John, well known as Mr. Frederick Robinson, afterwards Viscount Goderich and Earl of Ripon, and who was in 1823 Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Administration of Lord Liverpool, at which time he gained the nickname of "Prosperity Robinson," owing to the sanguine views which he took of the national resources of which he had the charge. Subsequently he became Prime Minister, President of the Board of Trade, and President of the Board of

THE ALEXANDRA, LATELY EXCHEQUERED BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT, AT LIVERPOOL

Control. The Marchioness De Grey died in 1779, when the marquisate expired for want of heirs male; but the barony of Lucas devolved upon her eldest daughter, Amabel, who had married, in 1772, Lord Polwarth, eldest son of the Earl of Marchmont, who was created Baron Hume in the peerage of Great Britain. By him she had no issue, and she was in 1816 created a peeress in her own right by the title of Countess De Grey, with remainder of that earldom to her sister, Lady Grantham, and her issue male. Lady Grantham died in 1830, and the Countess De Grey died in 1833, when she was succeeded by her nephew, Lord Grantham, who, as Earl De Grey, was well known as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from 1841 to 1844, during the last Administration of Sir Robert Peel. The Earl had issue only two daughters—Anne Florence, on whom the barony of Lucas descended on his death, and who married the sixth Earl Cowper; and Mary Gertrude, who married Captain Henry Vyner. Through such a singular series of vicissitudes as to have caused us to think them worth recording the two titles in his family descended and were united in the subject of the present memoir, whose Portrait we engrave in our current Number. Earl De Grey and Ripon married, in 1851, his cousin, the eldest daughter of Captain and Lady Mary Vyner, and has issue surviving one son, born January, 1852. Adopting on his entrance into public life very Liberal political views—indeed, as Viscount Goderich he was considered as something of, if not altogether, a Radical—his Lordship was first elected to a seat in the House of Commons for Hull, but was unseated on petition in March, 1853. In the following April he was elected for Huddersfield, which place he represented until the general election, 1857, when he was returned for the West Riding of Yorkshire, which seat he occupied till his advance to the peerage in 1859. While a member of the House of Commons, he on on more than one occasion brought forward special motions, all tending towards political and administrative reform. Being somewhat diminutive in person, and not possessing a very strong voice, though fluent in delivery and neat in his style, he did not reach the height of an effective speaker, although he was listened to with attention and respect. Personally he was very popular with members of all political creeds. His votes were uniformly given in favour of the extension of the suffrage, vote by ballot, and the abolition of church rates. In June, 1859, being then Earl of Ripon, and sitting in the House of Peers, he was appointed Under Secretary for War, Mr. Sidney Herbert being Secretary for War; but on that gentleman being raised to the peerage in 1861, the Earl having previously become Earl De Grey and Ripon, was transferred to the Under Secretaryship for India, his place at the War Office being taken by Mr. T. G. Baring, M.P. for Penryn, who was removed from the India Office for that purpose. During his tenure of office in the War Department, Earl De Grey and Ripon proved himself so successful an administrator (the organisation of the volunteer force, and the encouragement given by the Government to that body, are said to be owing chiefly to him), that on the death of Lord Herbert, and the appointment of Sir George Lewis to the Secretaryship for War, he was again appointed to the Under-Secretaryship, which he held until last month, when, on the decease of Sir George Lewis, his pretensions to the office of Secretary of State, with a seat in the Cabinet, were deemed so assured that they overcame the only difficulty which was raised—that of the hands of the Army and Navy being both members of the House of Peers, in addition to the fact that the Foreign and Colonial Secretaries were also members of that House—and he received the appointment which he now holds with general approval.

EXHIBITION OF HORTICULTURE AT NICE.

THANKS to the labours of the Agricultural and Horticultural Society at Nice, much progress has of late been made in the cultivation of this beautiful, highly-favoured, but hitherto much-neglected country.

In addition to stimulating professional horticulturists by the offer of prizes, &c., the society uses every means in its power to attract amateur gardeners; and, thanks to these efforts, the horticultural fête which took place on the 8th to the 12th ult., at Nice, in the gardens of Mons. De St. Aignaud, proved a great success.

This, the third annual exhibition, since the existence of the society, showed a considerable increase in the number of exhibitors. Three gold medals, one presented by the Empress of the French, another by the Prince of Monaco, and a third by the lady patronesses, were offered for competition, besides those given by the society. The exhibition was held this year in the most pleasant and picturesque neighbourhood of the city. Every arrangement was made for the comfort of the numerous and distinguished visitors, amongst whom were the King of Wurtemberg and the King of Bavaria.

The society is under the patronage of the Emperor of the French, and is aided by an annual grant of 2500 francs from the Government.

CRAMER'S ENGLISH PIANETTE. The Pianette is a Pianoforte of the smallest size that contains instruments. It has all the resources of the best Pianofortes of a larger size, and is unsurpassed for quality of tone, touch, and durability. Its portability and the compactness of the Pianette will be strengthened much more readily than on an old instrument, hence it is the best Pianoforte for a gentleman who has to travel. Price 50 guineas; in handsome Rosewood case, 55 guineas.

Purchasers are particularly requested to observe that this instrument has not the common or staple action, but the double or check action; and that CRAMER and CO. are the only manufacturers of it in England.

CRAMER'S DRAWING-ROOM COTTAGE Cramer and Co. manufacture a Cottage Pianoforte of the best description, possessing the full compass of seven octaves and a half. The touch is expressive, equal, and effective. The materials and workmanship are of the best description, and the instrument is guaranteed for five years. Price 35 guineas; in handsome Rosewood case, 40 guineas.

BOOSEY'S MINIATURE PIANOFORTE, price 17 guineas, in walnut or mahogany.—"We have had occasion to mention a new description of Pianoforte manufactured by Boosey and Sons, which combines quality and cheapness in a remarkable degree. The instrument is of small size, but the tone is in some such degree as could be expected in a child Grand—the most elegant music with the voice of a full-grown man. It has full compass, and a remarkably wide sweep of touch all the longest string-room; and the whole mechanism of the instrument seems to be of the best description. The Miniature Pianoforte has already been presented to the Duchess of Kent."—The Illustrated London News, Feb. 28, 1863. This Piano is well adapted for the cabin of a ship, or for the residence of persons in India.—BOOSEY and SONS, Holles-street, London.

EVANS' PEDAL ATTACHMENT (Patented), price 15 guineas, converts any Harmonium or Organ into a Pedal Instrument, and may be applied to any Instrument. The pedals can be attached or detached in two minutes. The instrument is in use at the Royal Italian Opera, Her Majesty's Theatre, Exeter Hall, &c. Testimonials of the invention and application of the pedals sent on receipt of stamp. An illustrated prospectus may be had upon application.—EVANS and CO., 314, Oxford-street, London, W.

EVANS'S ENGLISH HARMONIUMS. International Exhibition Prize Medal. These Instruments are manufactured in every variety, from 5 guineas to 100 guineas.
BOOSEY and CHING, 24, Holles-street, London.

CASE'S ENGLISH CONCERTINA'S. These well-known instruments, which still maintain their superiority over all others, are manufactured in every variety of size and remain unrivalled in tone, touch, and quality.
BOOSEY and CHING, Manufacturers, 24, Holles-street.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN PIANINO for the use of Families to which the Price Only is a Consideration. The very elegant Pianoforte, of small size, the full compass, check action, and possessing the same quality of tone and touch as Pianofortes costing double the money. Warranted to keep in tune, and to be the best and cheapest Pianoforte ever sold under 50 guineas.—CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

Price, in mahogany, rosewood, or walnut, 32 and 35 guineas. A great variety kept.—Chappell and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL'S TWENTY-GUINEA PIANOFORTE, with check action, in French polished oak case, with fret front. This Pianoforte is recommended for its great perfection at a foreign factory, expressly built with the view of making a really good Pianoforte (contrary to the usual custom). It has the very best check action, the full compass; is made in a neat case, and will be found to stand in tune well. It is strongly recommended as a good instrument for the money.—CHAPPELL and Co. strongly recommend this Pianoforte as superior in all respects to accordions or other cheap instruments. Advantage to pupils in practising on a good pianoforte, with a perfect touch, will be found immense. Price 20 guineas. A few of the same kind, with the full compass of 7 octaves, and handsome walnut case, 25 guineas.

CHAPPELL and CO.'S ENGLISH MODEL COTTAGE PIANOFORTE.—To ensure a perfect instrument, CHAPPELL and Co. have had a Pianoforte built of the best materials and workmanship, and strictly according to their own model, without regard to cost, and have succeeded in producing a moderate price. The action is of the same simple description as that employed in their Grand Pianofortes, and is free from the defects where the more complicated action are objectionable to many of their friends. The touch is elastic, and the tone is full and sympathetic. Price of this instrument in rosewood case, 50 guineas; in walnut, 52 guineas.
CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

BROADWOOD, COLLARD, and ERARD. The best Pianofortes of every description, including all the most recent improvements, may be obtained on hire by sale (and hired with option of purchase) at the new Showrooms of CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE, price 18 guineas, is recommended for its gentleness. This Instrument has three strings and the full compass of seven octaves, and is made with the view of producing perfect music to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in tune. The touch is extremely light, and the tone is remarkably full and rich, and the case is handsomely carved in Spanish mahogany. The touch is elastic, and the reputation very rapid. No Pianoforte has ever been introduced which has given such satisfaction to England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted. Packed for exportation, and sent to any part of the country.
CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

ERARD'S NEW BOUDOIR GRAND PIANOFORTE, at 150 guineas, having been now brought to perfection, can be had of CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

SECONDHAND PIANOFORTES. CHAPPELL and Co. have a large stock of SECONDHAND PIANOFORTES for Sale, by BROADWOOD, COLLARD, ERARD, CHAPPELL, and other eminent makers, which have been taken in exchange for Grand Pianofortes of their own make.

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

The great annual art-display in Trafalgar-square affords, we think, this year a more than usually cogent reason for the new Royal Commission to take into consideration the pressing need of removing the limitations as to number imposed on the conditions of the Academy under far different circumstances to those of the present day. The forty academicians and twenty associates who each may have command all the more or less distinguished artists of the days of Sir Joshua Reynolds, hardly now include a third of those with equal claims to the distinction. The original forty might now be fairly doubled at least, and the number of R.A.'s now existing be made up from the present preliminary honour of associateship should certainly be thrown open to all deserving artists; for any limitation here, except in respect of merit, appears to be simply absurd.

The chief strength of the present exhibition resides, unquestionably, in the works of "outsiders," as the Academy, somewhat unjustly, is considered an advance; but the much larger proportion of what interest it has will be found in the works of academicians, especially of figure subjects, by the many promising but comparatively little-known. We do not remember to have seen the academic body so poorly represented. Hardly half a dozen of these Olympians exhibit works of marked importance. Sir Edwin Landseer, who it was confidently expected would send a picture of "The Finding of the Franklin Relics," is absent. Sir Charles Eastlake, and the painters Mulready, Maclise, Dyce, and Cope (the last-named elected R.A.); the sculptors Gibson, Foley, Westmacott, as well as two or three architects, likewise send nothing. It is, however, but fair to remember that of this number the painter Maclise, Gibson and (let us hope) Dyce are engaged upon the mural paintings for the palace of Westminster, while some others are understood to be similarly employed. Sir Edwin Landseer is also reported to have been prostrated by the long-delayed loss of his mother, and consequent in the hanging, except in a very few instances of unaccountable carelessness, there seems to have been a desire to do justice to the younger men, so far as the rule which gives a right to "the line" is at the academicians and associates admits.

The picture which possesses the greatest or most immediate public interest, and which is also, we are disposed to think, the best painting in the exhibition, is, however, the work of a non-academician. We allude to Mr. Phillip's principal picture, "The House of Commons in 1860" (91), painted for the Queen. This title is too comprehensive literally, as it only includes the Speaker and the leading politicians on the Treasury and Opposition benches surrounding his table. The time intended, at we are informed, Lord Palmerston's speech on the French treaty. The Speaker occupies his green chair, and at his immediate right is Lord Clarendon. At the left, in front of the Speaker, and, like him, in their official wigs, sit the clerks, Sir Denis Le Marchant, Mr. Erskine May, and Mr. Barrett. Behind Lord Palmerston, stands addressing the House, and to his right, nearest the spectator, sits, notebook in hand, the late much-lamented Sir G. O. Lewis. Beyond, on the Treasury bench, are Lord Cecil, Lord Stanley, Sir George Grey, and Sir Charles Wood, to whom Mr. Charles Villiers stoops whispering. Behind Sir George Grey, and to his left, are Lord Sir Roundell Palmer, and, grouped together, Colden and Bright, with Lord Elcho a little in front. Mr. Massey leans against the back of Sir Milner Gibson coming in beyond. In the gallery behind the chair, in suitably rendered shadow, may be recognised Sir Francis Baring, Lord Hartington, Mr. Horsman, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Layard, Mr. Bentinck, Lord Palmerston, stands addressing the House, and to his right, nearest the spectator, sits, notebook in hand, the late much-lamented Sir G. C. Lewis. Beyond, on the Treasury bench, are Lord Cecil, Lord Stanley, Sir George Grey, and Sir Charles Wood, to whom Mr. Charles Villiers stoops whispering. Behind Sir George Grey, and to his left, are Lord Sir Roundell Palmer, and, grouped together, Colden and Bright, with Lord Elcho a little in front. Mr. Massey leans against the back of Sir Milner Gibson coming in beyond. In the gallery behind the chair, in suitably rendered shadow, may be recognised Sir Francis Baring, Lord Hartington, Mr. Horsman, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Layard, Mr. Bentinck, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Osborne, Mr. Walpole, Lord Talbot de Malahide, Mr. Henley, and Mr. Wyndham. Removed slightly further, leaning against the gallery, is Lord John Manners, and close to Mr. Milner Gibson appears Lord Robert Montagu. Peter Pattern.

Very seldom have we seen the difficulties of portrait composition and the management of unpicturesque modern costume so perfectly surmounted as here. Rarely is a work of this nature so free from the grouping less formal yet so free from obviously artificial variations, and even as contemporary art have we seen the light and shade so efficiently conducive to the best perfection of effect. Each personage has been made of the accessories so valuable to the painter—the furniture of the table, gilt mace, Speaker's wig, the clerks' wigs, books and papers, and volumes of statutes. The painting throughout is of the highest excellence. The artist has shown the most incredible self-reliance, perceived his own idiosyncracy. His style is as free and individualised as in the subjects chosen by his own hand. He has quite escaped the reproach of the baroness so common in these prescribed portraiture commissions. Frankly, we think there is not much doubt that Mr. Phillip has risen in these hands—nothing at once so solid, luminous, and true in tone. The landing for a moment to have left room for its proper display. This is, however, that this extraordinary facility of execution sometimes carries the painter away, and we might deendcate a little more exactitude in the drawing and refinement in the modelling. Greater precision would certainly have secured for the portraits more popular—and almost call we say—recognition. Is it not worth the pains? Had the painter's pencil been more restrained it would in all probability have lost in life and air. There is a touch of nature, however, to hint, seeing that Mr. Phillip has probably been influenced by the study of Velasquez. "Experts" tell us that the dash and fire of the great Spaniard are best appreciated down his pictures, in the final touches only, while there is evidence that the modelling was carefully completed in the under-painting through several stages. The living artist is, however, apparently less careful of this preliminary process. Mr. Phillip has also a picture of Spanish life, rich in colour, but in tone looking rather more heavily dyed than usual. "A Spanish Girl" (29) represents a peasant family at a church porch. The mother holds the sleeping child to the breviary, and permits a timid, reverent, gitan-like beggar girl to touch the baby with her finger that the latter has been innocently dabbling in it. There is charming feeling in the rendering of this incident.

There is quite a new quality of richness in the "Lucrezia Borgia" (170), by Mr. Elmore. The magnificent Duchess of Ferrara is a noble woman, but with low, sullen, corrupted brow and snakelike eyes, her low level with hats, stands receiving how she shall compass the destruction of some approaching victim. Her companion, a page, caleon brave, clutching a dagger in one hand and holding aside the tapestry of the door with the other, stands behind her. The page looks like a Igar; but she holds his arm, and the poison phial in her hand suggests her uncertainty as to the use to which the assassin necessarily safely her thirst for blood. Mr. Elmore's candid and appealing "Nos." (324) is a curious contrast to the last in expression.

Mr. Frith has a fascinating subject in "Ramsgate Sands," as seen by Romeo at the baloney. It is not an Italian "Juliet," but the artist may plead with more reason that Shakespeare himself has been a painter, would in all likelihood have given us an English girl; nor is it, in truth, a beauty of the Italian type. The artist, for this reason it will be generally thought the more captivating and lovable. The moonlight, even by Italy, requires considerable allowance for artistic license to believe in. Certainly the colour, like Venice, the painting of the face and white satin dress are truly admirable. Here are richness, pearlish breadth, and the quality of that open neatness and nattiness sometimes found in Mr. Frith's works. This picture, we may not improbably be surprised by Mr. Samuel Cousins.

Mr. R. M. Ward breaks comparatively new ground in his principal work, "Hogarth's Studio, 1726" (199)—a holiday visit of friends to view the portrait of Captain Coram. Mr. Ward here commemorates two hardly sufficiently appreciated heroes. First, there is Captain Coram, the "grand old sea captain," as Mr. Sala calls him in the passage from his "Life of Hogarth," quoted by the painter in the catalogue—one of the most genuine philanthropists that ever lived—the projector and principal friend and admirer of the good Captain, and who, if not the greatest of modern artists, was unquestionably the greatest champion of modern art. Mr. Ward could scarcely have hit upon a more pleasant incident in illustration of these two worthies than this of the children coming to see the admirable portrait—painted gratuitously by Hogarth for the hospital—of their benefactor. We may observe, en passant, that the original portrait was in the International Exhibition. Mr. Ward's picture also introduces a third personage—somewhat famous—engaged in the humble employment of cutting up cake for the children. We allude to Miss Hogarth, the pet daughter of the painter, and, like the lady who, when barely eighteen, left a home of comparative affluence to marry Hogarth, a step which while he was alive never made him a most excellent wife for forty years, and who religiously preserved his memory during twenty years of widowhood.

The scene of Mr. Ward's picture is a large room (to get an east light for painting) of Hogarth's house in Leicester-fields, now the north side of Leicester Hotel in the "square." Through the opened door we get a glimpse towards the opposite side, where lived Sir Joshua Reynolds. The shutters are thrown back, admitting a very great full-length portrait is on the easel. The globe (in allusion to the Captain's voyages), the scaled charter of the Foundling, and other accessories of the Captain's study, are on the mantelpiece. The children, unchecked by the old matron and the pedagogue, who remains at the door, are clustering round the cake. Hogarth's pet dog, tied to the leg of the table, seems to express by gestures these recognition and admiration of the work. Hogarth himself, but but one little urchin, overcome by the superior attractions of the cake which Mrs. Hogarth is about to dispense, and to which some, brought in at the moment, are already helping themselves, is common, is to be added. One little girl, with a very natural and pretty gesture, seems half disposed to run towards the back to see the painted effigy; while Hogarth's favourite pug Trump, which figures in his portrait of himself and now sits by his master's chair, seems to share her attention. It was a pleasant fancy to represent the children arrested with bunches of flowers and nosegays, gathered in the fields about Bloomsbury or the gardens of Leicester-fields, to present to the painter. To the right the elated painter, his fervid face as plain, but more comely, than in his portrait, is in animated conversation with a simple hearted old Captain himself, who, concealed behind his portrait, is also highly gratified with the warm recognition. It was probably at the surprise his intended appearance in propriâ personâ will create. The execution of this work is manly and solid, and there are some very good passages in the painting of the stuffs and the old uniform. The consequence is that the "material" is everywhere apparent. Mr. Ward has evidently painted his picture with a view to doubt honestly adopted for its probable durability; but we think the occasional touches in the shadows are rather too black and opaque in style. Making allowance for the studio light, and excepting parts, perhaps, of the white draperies, there is less unnecessary glitter and more breadth than we generally find in Mr. Ward's pictures. The conception and arrangement, and the popular interest of the picture, have caused it to be placed in the "honourable" position of the room.

"La Toilette des Morts" (124), belongs to his long series of works illustrative of Mr. Browning's poems. Browning's Spanish painter Cordoy looking ruefully at her portrait painted by Hauer; the mother recalling the days of her long tresses preparatory to the guillotine This is a very admirable picture, both in the style of engraving it, we shall return. It would be simply unjust to pass over Mr. W. Frith's "Sancho Panza and the Duke" as a work by the accomplished wife of the academician, making as it does a very considerable advance upon her previous efforts. The subject is taken from the lady contributors. We will, however, as we have permission to appraise the picture, content ourselves for the moment by mentioning that the subject is the well-known scene in which Sancho, on the infant (on the future King James) to the care of the Earl of Mar (380).

Cathalin the Great, by Mr. Pickersgill, is a portrait of Miss Kate Terry, if, in good scotch, so much as, the young painter, Mr. Calderon, an accomplished artist, and the eldest son of the academician. The figure is dressed with rare freedom from any approach to melodramatic exaggeration, is a large room of "The British Embassy at Paris on the Night of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew." The English Walsingham, who, sagacious as he was, has been completely taken by surprise by the Catholic treachery, is engaged in which swings the sign of each house, will), an old hostelry in front, and at the end of the line of low shops a glimpse of the quaint masts and turreted crossfires of the arguies on the Thames. Shakspeare sits beside the porch of the Swan Inn listening, with a sardonic smile, to a precious quartet—a justice, or garrulous burgher, pouring out his wise saws and modern instances; a swaggering swashbuckler, with his burly back towards us; a long, lank, empty-headed fopling, twirling his moustache, with a look of half vacant wondering belief in what is being said, and a bluff-faced listener grinning with an expression of shrewd sense and humour. Behind the poet is an opened window, whence proceeds the music of a merry party of guitarists. Up the street are other characters—a trademan, a Greek merchant (we presume), and a Turkish Jew. The great merit of this picture consists in the fact that no much suggest individuals of the dramatis personæ is done not so much suggest individuals of the dramatis personæ of Shakspeare's play as the types which the poet must have had in his mind's eye when he made his admirable improvement, too, in the painting compared with the artist's very amusing picture of "The Gossips" at the Sculptors' of last year.

We have dwelt at length upon the works now reviewed because they are those which will probably be found most attractive to visitors. In our next number we hope to notice the remaining figure-subjects.

(SECOND AND CONCLUDING NOTICE.)

THE notice we now give of the landscapes in this exhibition by the body of water-colour painters must refer to the present year as the "New Society," has been necessarily postponed. Many of the landscapes are monotonous in subject and treatment, but there is nevertheless sufficient diversity to well repay examination. Mr. Edmund Warren, son of the president, has one of the most elaborate and mark of the chief of the drawings he has exhibited during the last few years, and which has formed one of the principal attractions of this gallery. To say of it we think the smaller works here quite support the artist's reputation. There is an increasing tendency to exaggeration of style in the works of Mr. E. Warren always employs is used to an excess which, especially in some of the cloudscapes, gives a dingy and valued effect to the whole. The forms of the clouds become either limp or sullied. Still, after-touches of the distance become either limp or sullied. Still, much is left to most warmly admire. No. 24, "Sunset," is perhaps much is left to most warmly admire. No. 24, "Sunset," is perhaps the most powerful in colour, simply corolled in full sunlight, while the shadows of the decay clouds cheapen the distance, is in many respects quite masterly. "Pulling Home" (No. 7) is also powerful though low-toned intensity of purple heather, golden gorse, and almost orange-hued man's head, are wrought out with much earnestness. The impression often is the aspect of nature at such moments.

The old favourites at this gallery are scarcely well represented. Mr. Bennett's head in this exhibition is not favourable as ever; Mr. M'Kewan as dashing, bold, and effective; Mr. Rowbotham as admirable in manipulation and workmanship, but Mr. Penley's view of Ullswater is more careful and truthful than usual—that is to say, there is less reliance upon conventional forms and more upon that which always betray themselves. Nor, however, is however, represented by drawings, smaller, less pretentious, and less elaborate examples than usual. We have seen Mr. Fahey also to more advantage.

Recurring to Mr. Bennett, we must, in addition to what we have said of the artist's suggestive breadth, add that he frequently compensates for the want of individualised character, also express our admiration of his fine small heads. Mr. Rowbotham is also seen everywhere preserved—a precious quality in all the artist's work, but more than usually noteworthy this year. No. 29, "Beaumaris," and the works, "The Old Hall, Hardwicke, Derbyshire" (233), we shall engrave. With all our respect for Mr. Rowbotham's ability, and our admiration for several fine drawings by him, we think a slipshod "The Castle of Ischia" (192), it certainly becomes obvious, in his monotonous "surface-blue" seas and skies, that he is unconscious of his foreground, that Mr. Rowbotham is inclined to fall into a routine method of painting which enables the spectator to himself not to nature. Mr. D'Egville has several creditable Venetian views, but not in advance of previous efforts. Mr. Robins is always admirable in marine drawings. Few painters of landscape can so preserve better keeping between the condition of the sea and the aspect of the sky. Mr. Whymper contributes a few drawings representing water—see the still water in "Bodiam Castle" (48), and the "Pond near Leigh Hall, Essex" (240)—and Mr. Gastineau's "bit" and the moving, seething, and eddying waves in two views of Clovelly Pier (Nos. 23 and 198). His watery surface gets, however, in the first-named work into an over-elaborate texture. Mr. Gastineau's precision and breadth of touch; but in painter of his realistic tendencies these can, unless this sketchy style is carefully studied, easily get beyond a certain point of no particular height of attainment. Mr. Mole has generally been seeking too extensive effects in a slipshod and "prettifying" execution (which if sought as an end, not unconsciously forced on the painter as a means, is a grave mistake), and has lost, unfortunately his own pleasant, simple, and truthful individuality. The "Meeting Father" (217) is pretty, but wanting in earnestness and natural force. Mr. Hayes's "Lane" (3) is well founded with the artist of the same name in the senior society) has a low-toned sentiment of "Carnarvon Castle" (4), under an effect of twilight. Mr. Mitchell has also some unusually good drawings.

But the proportionate interest of this part of the exhibition is greatest in the contributions of the more recently elected members and younger associates, Messrs. Shalders, Leitch, Reed, Dunn, and Boyce.

Mr. Shalders is a conspicuous and original member of the society. This is only sketch associates exhibits rustic subjects and pastoral landscape, with sheep, &c. His method of execution is slightly formed upon that of Mr. Birket Foster. It is not to be regretted, however, that he has less mechanically and more individually studied his subjects, occasionally elegant, and that Mr. Shalders makes less use of body-colour. In the high and invaluable quality of true "breadth" is he decidedly the superior. Mr. Foster gets a certain roundness in his work by mechanical uniformity of touch; this artist secures the same impression by the higher artistic means of varied touch, varied intensity of tone and graduated mass. This breadth of tone is especially noteworthy in a small but very beautiful drawing of deer and cattle, No. 15, "Under the Leatherhead, Surrey" (281), in which the sky, with its rose-tinted cloudlets, its blue and pearl, and band of horizontal gold, at all seems evening light, the earth all twilight repose and mystery. Nothing can be more broad quality is observable, notwithstanding passages of neglect "hatching" in the latter drawing, "Kirkstall Abbey, Yorkshire" (197), and notwithstanding that the effect is intentionally a partial one, occasioned by the shadows of the trees, which, with their varied shadows are most charmingly painted.

Mr. Leitch, the well-known member, contributes several masterly drawings, of which the most important are "The Breaking of the Mist on Ben Cruachan, Argyleshire" (262) "The Gulf of Salerno" (73), and "Near Sant'Agata Sande Adriano, Calabria" (72). The latter scenes are very true to the average aspect of the scenes represented.

Mr. J. C. Reed comes to the very front rank in the very views of the Irish lakes and mountains of Killarney, particularly "Muckross from the Gussen Tower" (205) and "Glenflesk and Mangerton" (116). This artist inclines to heaviness in effect, only it would seem, however, from an excess of executive power, which is the more remarkable as mistake is made in the drawing of the trees, of weight and firmness. Mr. Reed has evidently, also, that mental grasp of the broad relations of his subject which is near akin to imagination. Still more noteworthy, perhaps, for its strength of character, depth of colour, and expression of primitive grandeur is "Dunloe Gap, Cove" (313). "The Lizard Lighthouse" (230) is little less effective.

Mr. Hine, who was elected with Mr. Shalders, has an unselected feeling for broadly impressive aspects of nature, and a power to render large atmospheric gradations or phenomena. Several of his works witness this for him, as the "Hall Sands" (11), which, however, is a deservedly favourite subject with our water-colour painters, but given by Mr. Hine from an unusual point of view—namely, Fleet-street; "Eye, from the Marshes" (240), with the low sun sweeping along the level reaches; the old ruinous Winchelsea, the Cliffe at Hastings, and "The Great Fire at Cotton's Wharf, seen from the New Cattle Market" (284). Mr. Deane, another recently-elected associate, sends a number of drawings of the streets of Vitré, a crazy, tumble-down old town in Brittany, which have some of the best characteristics of Samuel Prout. Mr. M. A. Hayes, an Irish artist, has an effective drawing of "A Regiment of Hussars upon the March—Kavanagh of Kildare" (138); and by the brother of this artist there are several very good marine drawings.

A study of a magpie and several small landscape studies by Mr. Sutcliffe have much unnatural blackness and photographic rigidity; but the delicate painting of a few details in the most immediate foreground will delight the pre-Raphaelite amateur. Mr. Sutcliffe seems for some years to have stopped at the very threshold of art. Mrs. Duffield advances every year in her admirable drawings of still-life. Several flower-pieces here are remarkable for beauty of arrangement, harmony of tone, and delicacy of touch. Mr. Hunt's contributions, though being neither affectedly broad on the one hand, nor finical and Dutch on the other, are charming of "Hydrangea, &c." (155), we would select for especial commendation.

At No. 7, Haymarket, an exhibition has been opened with the, at present, misleading title "Scandinavian Gallery." The art of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway is represented by a number of paintings, some of them of enormous size, by Marcus Larsen, a Swedish landscape and marine painter, and Messrs. Gude and Lund, who have had his ambition. We should very gladly welcome such a collection of pictures by the Norwegian painters Tidemand, Hall, Verlenden, Gude, Lund, Hansen Eckert, Nordenburg, Wallander, and Mélle. Lindegren; the Dance Scrensen, Simonsen, Ernst, Jacobsen, Skovgaard, Sonne, Hansen, and other Scandinavian Scandinavian painters. It is, we understand, the intention to form such a collection here, but the present gallery cannot contain the present collection required, however, to lengthened notice in detail. The largest picture, the "Storm on the Coast of Jutland," by Mr. Gude, was exhibited at the International Exhibition. M. Larsen is a painter of great power, but this unexceptionally tempts him into a monotonous repetition. The pictures we have named, a burning steam-boat running on shore at night, with various effects of moonlight and sea-spray, are all alongside with overwhelming the modesty of nature, and also with a too-obviously systematic method of rendering them so. The Scandinavian painters like striking effects, but with the scale and novelty of the effects represented, will repay a visit.

In the same house is the gallery in which Mr. and Mrs. German Reed give their very capital new entertainment, supplemented by Mr. Parry's amusing musical sketch, "Mr. Punch's Trip to Paris," now published (in the daytime) in large nondescript representation—a panting of "The Apocalyptic Vision of St. John," by Mr. Danby, painting of "The Apocalyptic Vision of St. John," by Mr. Danby, the well-known painter in fresco and oil, and the winner of one of the first prizes in the Westminster Hall competition. Mr. Danby's picture is on a canvas of hundreds of figures, and is of gigantic proportions, but we regret to say its merits are not commensurate with its size. It endeavours to reproduce the effects of Martin and Danby; but it has not the "material sublimity," the impressive aerial, and, we may add, supernatural phenomena of the former, nor the well-imagined supernatural phenomena of the former, nor the skilful figure-painting—the suggestions of power—of the latter. Mr. Danby's "Apocalyptic Vision" is about with a result so inadequate. The picture may obtain more popularity in the Exhibition Room than it will in the Picture Gallery.

The exhibition of sculpture by the Royal Horticultural Society, at South Kensington, was opened on Saturday afternoon by their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and suite attended just before the public opening for a private view.

Mr. George Scharf, jun., has left the service of showing, by command of the Queen, his picture, "The Worship of Bacchus," to her Majesty at Windsor Castle.

The city of Birmingham has presented to her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales a very handsome testimonial of the sense entertained of her marriage. The design for the table is very elaborate, tasteful, and appropriate, and in the style of the best period of Renaissance metalwork. The upper surface is covered with a group of figures in bronze and gemi, all intended to have reference to the auspicious marriage, symbolising the union of England and Denmark. The groups in the upper procession. These are allegorical representations of Fortune, Love, Honour, Fame, Plenty, Victory, the Arts, Peace, Industry, Concord, &c. On the panels of the legs with the shaft of the pedestal six three chivalric guardian figures. Birmingham could not have chosen a more appropriate present, or one better fitted to display its triumphs of metal manufacture.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS

THE AGENCY OF ATMOSPHERIC OXYGEN in the destruction of dead animal and vegetable matter was the subject of a communication which was read before the French Academy of Sciences the results of his experiments, which are of considerable importance, showing that very many substances, such as wine, milk, damp wood shavings, and abominations of all sorts, are rapidly destroyed by the oxygen in the vases and jars of the germs of the lowest organisms. These substances not only did not undergo putrefaction, but they slowly changed, and after a time went a very insignificant oxidation. After several years of exposure to a temperature varying from 50deg. and 84 deg. Fahr., the oxygen in the vases was not entirely consumed, and in some cases only a very small quantity had been consumed. The results of the experiments were obtained under the same conditions, but under the influence of the development of the germs of the lowest organisms, which, having been replaced by carbonic acid. These little beings, which are invisible to the naked eye, produce the same decomposition of animal and vegetable organic matters. The energy of their action is sometimes very considerable, as in the case of the transformation of wine into vinegar by the mycoderme, made known by M. Pasteur about a year ago. These experiments are regarded by M. Pasteur as the new basis of the doctrine of spontaneous generations and to the modern theory of fermentation.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL delivered his first lecture "On Sound" on Tuesday, the 28th ult. He stated that the sound of a gun is caused by the explosion of a small balloon containing oxygen and hydrogen gases. Sound is communicated by waves of air, and not by any particles which are projected and has to put more matter in motion, the sound becomes weaker. If, however, the wave of sound be inclosed in a tube (as in the case of the speaking tube), it loses none of its force. The rate of velocity of sound, like light and heat, is reflected and refracted; and by the reflection of sound from a concave surface, as in the case of the ear trumpet, it was shown that sound cannot be propagated in a vacuum. The velocity of sound is greater in proportion to the density of the air, and velocity increases as the temperature is raised. The velocity is also about five times greater in water than in air. The lecturer then said: "The solid, as well as the liquid, transmits sound; and we can transmit through liquid columns and solid rods, and even cords, enough to make the hearer "hear a distance." In a room beneath the lecture theatre was placed a pianoforte, to the sounding-board of a harp in the theatre. At a signal given music was performed, which, of course, was distinctly heard in the theatre by the harp and keen there. When the rod was separated from the harp the music became inaudible in the theatre.

PROFESSOR ANSTED gave his third lecture on Thursday, April 30, the subject of which was "The Coal Measures in Various Parts of England," on Physical Science on Geology. He commenced with an examination of the various questions on the probable origin of coal. He said that it was generally produced by some impalpable movement in the crust of the earth, due to a lifting-up like that which is now going on in some parts of the world. Some attention to the west coast of Sweden, where the surface—the regular progress of the sea—was slowly rising, and the sea was slowly receding from the land. Especial chalk and other geological strata, the progress of which

MDLLE. CARLOTTA PATTI.

On Carlotta's return from this melancholy mission she found her sister Adelina busily engaged, under the tuition of Signor Bosia, in those vocal studies which have ended in her present world-wide celebrity. As much, probably, to dissipate the gloom which still hung over her spirit as with any definite ulterior object, the elder sister became a fellow-pupil under Adelina's master. The emulation which sprang up under these circumstances, and gave additional ardour to the sister students, will account for the rapid progress which was made by them, but especially by Carlotta, whose more mature age and previous studies gave more earnestness and efficiency to her endeavours. In a year she was pronounced an accomplished vocalist, and obtained an engagement to appear as concert singer in New York. This was in the year 1861. The well-known American impresario, M. Uhlmann, being present at her début, had no difficulty in forming a judgment as to her present merits and future prospects, and he engaged her at once for the grand concerts of the New York Academy of Music. Here her success was fully confirmed, and with this stamp of currency upon her she commenced a tour through the principal cities of the North American States, in each of which the musical public unhesitatingly ratified the verdict of the capital of American civilisation. Then came the great earthquake that rove asunder the vast American empire, and it might have been thought that the new-blown honours of the young vocalist were destined to be smothered in the smoke of battle. Quite the reverse, for Mdlle. Patti proved the truth of the homely proverb about an ill wind. The war storm that swept over the land blew her newly-launched barque not only into a port of safety, but one where its merchandise was at a high premium, and the highest honours awaited the captain. The bulletins of the battle-fields had more interest than any other works of invention which theatrical managers could offer the public of New York; and the voice of rumour, with its ever-changing moods—now solemn, now triumphant—rendered every other vocal performance insipid in comparison. The managers of the Opera House were at the end of their wits to discover an attraction strong enough to fix the attention of this war-bewildered people, and luckily bethought them of persuading Carlotta Patti to make her début on the stage, a step which she had always had the greatest reluctance to take, owing to a slight defect in her gait, the result of an accident in her childhood. This appeal from her early patrons came to her in so strong a form as one which, if successful, offered the only probable resource to save them from the most complete financial discomfiture, that Mdlle. Patti courageously overcame those sensitive apprehensions which only those who are similarly afflicted can fully comprehend, and which, in the case of a woman, are multiplied tenfold. That this drawback was not likely to operate in any very perceptible degree, however, may easily be inferred from the very fact of the directors of the Opera House having ventured on inducing Mdlle. Patti to make her appearance; and, indeed, had the defect been one which could be less easily disguised than is actually the case, the brilliancy of the débutante's vocalisation, her handsome and expressive countenance, and her natural grace of manner, added to her decided power of dramatic expression, would have blinded her audience to its existence. During this engagement, which answered all the expectations built upon it and entirely restored the Opera House to prosperity, Mdlle. Patti performed the same round of characters in which her sister Adelina had so brilliantly distinguished herself. After her appearances on the lyrical stage Carlotta again visited the principal cities of the Northern States and drew large audiences, whether as an operatic performer or merely a concert singer. Since the Americans have sent us Adelina Patti we are a little more disposed to place faith in their critical verdicts. Nevertheless, Mdlle. Carlotta Patti's first appearance before a London audience, and that composed of the enlightened and critical part of the public who support Mr. Gye's establishment, was fraught with doubt and misgiving, and the night of Thursday, April 16, 1863, will ever be a memorable one in the career of this now firmly-established artist. A concert after a long opera is not the most brilliant portal through which to issue out upon a new and untried public, and the qualities of an artist must possess in them something actually startling to rouse an audience thus jaded by a long performance to even the point of decent attention. Such was essentially the case by good fortune in this instance, the extraordinary reach of Mdlle. Patti's voice in the upper region answering fully the existing exigency for a "sensation." When those wonderful larklike notes, which seem to descend from some ethereal region, had once been heard, the débutante had produced the only credentials which at that hour of the night could have gained her a hearing, and she was at leisure to display all her other qualifications as an accomplished and highly-trained bravura singer with a certainty of appreciation which, but for the good fortune of her being a vocal phenomenon, she might in vain have expected. Mdlle. Carlotta Patti is now the star of the musical season, and as such drew, at the last concert of the New Philharmonic Society, the largest assembly that has ever been contained in St. James's Hall.

AMATEUR THEATRICALS AT THE BIJOU THEATRE.

On Friday evening, May 1, a fashionable amateur performance, in aid of the funds of the Benevolent Society, took place at this pleasant little theatre, under the distinguished patronage of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge and her Royal Highness Princess Mary. The programme included "The Loan of a Lover" and "Ticklish Times;" but the pièce de résistance of the evening was Mr. Samuel Lover's clever comedy of "The Wild Horse of the Peppers," which, as being a more important work than is ordinarily attempted by amateurs, depending chiefly for its attractiveness on the individual merit of the actors and actresses engaged in it, might be considered a particularly bold undertaking, though the hazard of the venture was fully justified by the success achieved. The cast was as follows:—

Colonel Chesham	Viscount Raynham, M.P.
Major Hans Mansfield	W. Ashe, Esq.
Darby Donoghue	Unick Lawler, Esq.
Phelim	Algernon Joy, Esq.
Monk	W. Maunsell, Esq.
Gerald Pepper	W. H. Maitland, Esq.
Dillon	T. Bowles, Esq.
Madeline	The Hon. Mrs. G. Wrottesley.
Agatha	Lady Ann Sharon.

Mr. W. H. Maitland, as Gerald Pepper, and Mr. Ashe, as Major Mansfield, sustained their important parts with the most admirable discretion, and by the strong contrast they afforded in their interpretation of the characters of the roystering Irishman and the phlegmatic Dutchman imparted more than ordinary relief to the comedy. But the feature of the piece was the Agatha of Lady Ann Sharron, this lady contriving to invest a comparatively feeble and unimportant part with the greatest interest by her esprit and dramatic feeling. In the course of the play she danced a Connaught jig with Mr. Joy with marked grace, this portion of the entertainment being so thoroughly appreciated as to receive a most enthusiastic encore. Mr. Maitland's song, "The Ranting, Roving Blade," received a similar compliment. The preliminary training of the actors had evidently been of the most careful description. They were perfect in their parts, and the niceties of stage business and by-play were thoroughly attended to. Viscount Raynham, Mr. Unick Lawler, Mr. Joy, and Mr. Bowles sustained their respective parts with complete verve, finish, and with much of the finish and completeness of practised professionals.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

FIELD MARSHAL LORD SEATON, G.C.B.

The Right Hon. Sir John Colborne, Baron Seaton, of Seaton, in the County of Devon, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, G.C.B., G.C.H., K.C.M.G., M.T., K.S.G., Colonel of the 2nd Life Guards, and a Field Marshal in the Army, one of the last survivors of his time, was a scion of the old Somersetshire family of Colborne, of Wilby Hill, and was the only son of Samuel Colborne, Esq., by his wife, Cordelia Anne, daughter of John Gastrill, Esq., of Compton Dando and Ballycarran, in the county of Limerick, a descendant of the Gastrills of Walton, Lancashire. He was born in 1779, and was a pupil at Christ's Hospital, and afterwards at Winchester School; but his military career was of the livelier character, for he was appointed an Ensign in the Army July 19, 1794, and within fifteen years after had risen to be a Lieutenant-Colonel. Colborne first saw service in North Holland, during the campaign of 1799. He was next in Egypt in 1801, and in the same year was sent to Neapolitan frontier with the Anglo-Russian force, and was present at the battle of Maida, in Sicily and Calabria till January, 1806, when he returned to England. We next find him (1808-9) in Military Secretary, first to Sir John Moore, in Sicily and the Mediterranean, and then to Sir John Craddock in Portugal, and Sir Hew Dalrymple (1808), and Sir John Moore in Sicily and Sweden, Portugal, and Spain (1808). He was present at the battle of Maida, in the heroic chief. In 1808 he joined Lord Wellington's army in Spain, as Secretary, and was one of the Marshal's most trusted and valued Peninsular friends. After the battle of Douna, at which he was present, he conducted a bridge in Sir Rowland Hill's division. In 1810 he was detached in command of it to Castelleaon, for the purpose of observing the movements of General Reynier's corps d'armée on the line of march to Portugal. At the battle of Busaco and the retreat to the lines of Torres Vedras, Colborne commanded a brigade which was the last to pass beyond the town of Alcantara and the advanced posts near Villafranca, and he held his ground until Massena had retired behind the Tagus, when he was commanded a brigade. At Ciudad Rodrigo he, with a force of the Light Division, stormed the redoubt of San Francisco on the 19th January, and with him at their head the 52nd Light Infantry victoriously assaulted the fortress and town. Again under him, in 1813, the Light Division was led to victory by their heroic conduct on the Heights of Vera, at the battles of Nivelle and the Nive, and during the operations of the campaign in the South of France. It was Colborne who carried the ridge called the Bear's Back at Bidboa, and the troops then rushed on to the assault of the interior redoubts of the enemy's Bayonette Mountain and the Pass of Vera. Colborne's since during many chapters matter of a large fort on the extreme right of the position. At Orthez, Colonel Colborne led the attack on Scott's position; and he commanded the second brigade of the Light Division at the Nivelle, and at Nive, and the 52nd at Toulouse. In fine, throughout the whole Peninsular War, wherever there was the greatest or daring the most arduous duty to perform, there he found adding lustre to success by the very rapidity and brilliancy of his exploits. At the close of 1814 he was appointed Aide-de-Camp to the Prince Regent and military secretary to the Prince of Orange, Commander of the British Army in the Netherlands, and was at the battle of Quatre Bras and Waterloo (1815), and it is partly owing to his able and energetic conduct of the victorious day that the credit for the charge which Colborne originated at the moment and so materially contributed to, was due to him. He was afterwards employed on the highly importance of the movement, cried out "Well Wellington, Colonel Colborne was ready to do anything you wished." At Orleans, Colonel Colborne led the attack on Scott's position; and he commanded the second brigade of the Light Division at the Nivelle, and at Nive, and the 52nd at Toulouse. After the battle of Douna, at which he was present, he conducted a bridge in Sir Rowland Hill's division. In 1810 he was detached in command of it to Castelleaon, for the purpose of observing the movements of General Reynier's corps d'armée on the line of march to Portugal. At the battle of Busaco and the retreat to the lines of Torres Vedras, Colborne commanded a brigade which was the last to pass beyond the town of Alcantara and the advanced posts near Villafranca, and he held his ground until Massena had retired behind the Tagus, when he was commanded a brigade. At Ciudad Rodrigo he, with a force of the Light Division, stormed the redoubt of San Francisco on the 19th January, and with him at their head the 52nd Light Infantry victoriously assaulted the fortress and town. Again under him, in 1813, the Light Division was led to victory by their heroic conduct on the Heights of Vera, at the battles of Nivelle and the Nive, and during the operations of the campaign in the South of France. It was Colborne who carried the ridge called the Bear's Back at Bidboa, and the troops then rushed on to the assault of the interior redoubts of the enemy's Bayonette Mountain and the Pass of Vera. Colborne's since during many chapters matter of a large fort on the extreme right of the position. At Orthez, Colonel Colborne led the attack on Scott's position; and he commanded the second brigade of the Light Division at the Nivelle, and at Nive, and the 52nd at Toulouse. In fine, throughout the whole Peninsular War, wherever there was the greatest or daring the most arduous duty to perform, there he found adding lustre to success by the very rapidity and brilliancy of his exploits. At the close of 1814 he was appointed Aide-de-Camp to the Prince Regent and military secretary to the Prince of Orange, Commander of the British Army in the Netherlands, and was at the battle of Quatre Bras and Waterloo (1815), and it is partly owing to his able and energetic conduct of the victorious day that the credit for the charge which Colborne originated at the moment and so materially contributed to, was due to him. He was employed on the highly importance of the movement, cried out "Well Wellington, Colonel Colborne was ready to do anything you wished." At Orleans, Colonel Colborne led the attack on Scott's position; and he commanded the second brigade of the Light Division at the Nivelle, and at Nive, and the 52nd at Toulouse.

Ireland has of late been peculiarly unfortunate in the multiplied loss, within almost every instance, of statesmen of the solidity who had made the esteem of the country. Thus the amiable and excellent Marquess of Normanby, and the good and generous Lord Clarendon, Lady St. Germans and Lady Eglinton have all within a few years, died in the prime of life and in the midst of great ral regard. To these may be added the worthy Viscount Dungannon, somewhat later, but still in the vigour of a particularly healthy life, who died the other day; and now their deservedly-popular Viscount Massereene, whose demise is the result of an accident, has unexpectedly been announced. This nobleman, the Right Hon. Sir John Skeffington Foster-Skeffington, 8th Viscount Massereene, Viscount Ferrard, Baron Oriel of Collon, Baron Oriel of Collon, in the county of Louth, in the peerage of Ireland, and Baronet of Ferrard, in the county of Louth, in the Baronetage of the United Kingdom, was the eldest son of Thomas Henry Viscount Ferrard and Barbara Lucy, eldest daughter of the late Sir John Skeffington-Smyth, Bart., and Barbara Leighton, and was born on the 11th of May, 1809. He succeeded his father as Viscount Ferrard and Baron Loughgrash, Jan. 2, 1843, and his father as Viscount Ferrard and Baron Oriel, Jan. 18, 1844. He married, Aug. 1, 1835, Olivia Deane, fourth daughter (by his wife, Dorcas Syrnot) of Deane Deane Deane, Esq., of Lodge in the county of Limerick, and Shillegran Castle, in the county of Dublin, by whom he has had issue four sons and four daughters. Lord Massereene was a liberal in politics, and his benevolent mien he lreland. He ranked high among the able, influential, and popular landowner there. He had also served many distinguished Rile "O'Sullivan," a Legend of Killarney," was received with much favour; and his volume called "Church Melodies," published in 1858, with music by himself, has been adopted into general use. Some of the hymns for the principal festivals of the church which it contains are peculiarly touching. The "alphabetical" hymns at the end of the book are very ingenious and interesting. In 1860 his Lordship published a poem of considerable merit, called "The Love of God," developing, as he said, "the process by which before the law it was ordained that man should be redeemed through the love of God and the love of God." Lord Massereene was a Deputy Lieutenant for the county of Antrim and Lieutenant-Colonel of the Belfast Militia. He was a man of universal appreciation of the Irish public, been made a Knight of St. Patrick in 1851. His death was terrible, indeed, and occurred thus:—The noble Lord was standing on a hooked-up terrace in the grounds of his fine seat, Antrim Castle, which, with the town of Antrim, he himself had so much improved. This terrace was on one side sloped and on the other perpendicular and faced with stone. His Lordship was fastening a pew-rose to a stake, and the stake, being rotten, gave way. Lord Massereene reeling heavily upon it, so that, losing his balance, he was precipitated over the considerable facade of perpendicular side. Unfortunately, he fell on a stone, the sharp edge of which came in contact with his supine just below the neck. There was no external wound, but the exertions of the most skilful surgeons were of no avail to avert the result. His Lordship lingered a short time, and died on the 26th ult. No words can describe, as his end occurred, the anguish of the family, and the deep sorrow of the population of Antrim; and, we m ned, the grief was great of the whole north of Ireland, and indeed of all who knew him, personally or by reputation. The late Lord is succeeded by his eldest son, Lieut.-Colonel John, now Viscount Massereene and Ferrard, who is in his twenty-first year. This family of Foster-Skeffington, Viscount Massereene and Viscount Ferrard, springs maternally from Sir William Skeffington, Kt., King Henry VIII.'s Commissioner to Ireland in 1519, whose descendant, Sir John Skeffington, succeeded, by special limitation, his father-in-law, Sir John Conyers, as Lord Conyers' cavalier, as second Viscount Massereene and Loughnaah. The fifth Viscount was created Earl of Massereene, which earldom ended with the fourth Earl, while the viscountcy passed to his daughter, the mother of the Pure just died. The paternal grandfather of the late Viscount Massereene was the Right Hon. Thomas Henry Foster, Chancellor of the Irish House of Commons, whose wife was created Viscountess Ferrard in 1797, and who was himself created Baron Oriel in 1821.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

P. T. D.—It not exactly resolvable a problem by "1. R," which, in turn, was only a mistake.

SMITH.—Shall send directly.

F. C., Swansea College.—It shall be reported next week. In future, it will save trouble to you, and expedite the solution of the problem, to send it direct to the Chess Editor, Walworth.

I. B. D., Edinburgh.—The move in question has no effect whatever upon the subsequent play.

J. H. Dryden.—Your solution of No. 1000 is correct. We have received some communications from Mr. Dryden, but none of the problems he mentions. Some time ago we sent Mr. Dryden a copy.

DRYDEN.—Eugene No. 1282 is perfectly correct. The leading moves are—1. Ks from E 1 to Q B 1st (ch), &c.

J. Q. K. K. B.—Your problem is not sufficiently difficult.

Mr. Dawson, of Leeds, whose problems were published in our Number for Aug. 30, 1862, has sent us—1. Q to K R 8th, and 2. Q to K B 8th (mate).

H. F. N.—Doubtful, but quite impracticable while the draw column is printed in the same number. Your solution of No. 1000 is correct.

Mr. Dawson, of Leeds, has favoured us with the following analysis of the proposed match between the Cambridge and Oxford Universities:—"Sufficiently rejected" the rules laid down in the letter from the Cambridge Club, which appeared in the Illustrated London News, and of the Philadelphian players remarks that, at the meeting held on the subject of the laws governing the match, it was resolved that "the Rules of the Philadelphia Club should be generally followed." The meeting declared that "in the present state of chess science the old code, because it was the only code which had anything like a general sanction, but that a more perfect system was much desired." Mr. Staunton, in the Illustrated London News, in the issue of the 7th of March, 1863, says:—"The rules of the game in the great tournament now being held in Paris have been drawn up by the Committee of the Paris Chess Club, and are in the following terms:—[Here he gives the rules of a few pages.]

I. C. Belfast.—The solution of Problem No. 995 was published in the Number for Feb. 14.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Viscountess D'Alte, wife of Victor Nicolas D'Alte, of the kingdom of Portugal, was proved in London, on the 22nd ult., by the oaths of Charles Augustus Ellis, Esq., of Charles-street, Berkeley-square, and R. B. Clarke, Esq. The personal property was sworn under £60,000, and the testatrix was formerly Miss Harriet Maugin Brown, residing at 31, Portland-place, Clifton, near Bristol, and was married to the late Count D'Alte, Chevalier Joao Carlos de Horta Teller Machado, Knight of the Royal Order of Christ, and Gentleman of the Bedchamber to the late deceased British subject and Peninsular Regent of Portugal, Dom Pedro, Duke of Braganza, and died on the 18th of September last at Oporto, in Italy. The will contains numerous legacies and annuities, including bequests to servants, and a sum of £100 to the Governor of the Clifton Female Orphan Asylum. Her Ladyship leaves the residue of her funded property she leaves to her mother; but, should her mother not survive her Ladyship, the residue is then to become the property of the acting executors for their own benefit. Viscountess D'Alte possessed a property of considerable value in Portugal, which she devised to her mother. This sum her Lordship disposes of by bequeathing to two of her friends residuary legacies of £500 each, and the remainder, with the proceeds, to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, to be applied more particularly in the establishing of hospitals for the reception of sick animals separate away from the densely-populated places, and for protection against the cruelty of the animal-hospitals.

The will of the Right Hon. Thomas Charles Hanbury-Tracy Baron Sudeley, of Toddington, near Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, Gregynog, in the county of Montgomery, and 6, Grosvenor-square, Middlesex, who died on the 5th inst., by Lord Sudeley, and Philip Pusey, Esq., the testator's brother-in-law, was proved under £70,000. The father of the late Baron Sudeley married secondly the surname of Hanbury, thereby having married the only child and heir of the last Viscount Tracy (title now extinct). The testator died on the 5th inst., in the 79th year of his age. His Lordship succeed his will in June, 1857, and added two codicils on the 15th of September, 1858, and the 1st of January, 1863. His Lordship married, in 1808, the title out estates in 1838, and attained the age of sixty-two, and is succeeded by his eldest son, the present Lord Sudeley, who was born on the 22nd of July, in his twenty-sixth year. The testator has left a liberal bequest to his relict beyond the provisions of the settlement, and to his daughter £25,000; and to his daughter £25,000; and there are annuities of £500 each to three of his sisters. The residue of the property he has bequeathed to his eldest son and heir.

The will of William Gregson, Esq., late of Liverpool, has been proved in London. The personalty was sworn under £50,000. The testator has bequeathed upwards of £10,000 to different societies and institutions, principally in Liverpool, as follows:—To the Liverpool Church Aid Society, and the Liverpool Church of England Education Society, £500 each; to the Liverpool Royal Infirmary, Blind Asylum, Eye Dispensary, Royal Hospital, School for the Blind, Deaf and Dumb Institution, Eye and Ear Infirmary, Church of England Magdalen Institution, County Refuge, and the National School, Edge-hill, each £100; and to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, Church Missionary Society, Colonial Church School Society, Church Pastoral Aid Society, Irish Church Missions to Roman Catholics, and to the Manx Protestant College, each £100. The residue, after the above-mentioned and other legacies to his relations, servants, and others, he bequeaths to two of the executors.

THE MAGAZINES.

Fraser's Magazine is excellent this month. The most elaborate and important papers are the very sensible discussion of the affairs of the Church of England, with which the number commences, and the careful summary of the negotiations of our King Henry VII. with Ferdinand and Isabella, recently produced from the Archives of Simancas. But perhaps present circumstances may impart a deeper interest to the brief but most discriminating character of the late Sir George Lewis, evidently from the pen of one who knew him well. No paper, however, has pleased us more than Miss Cobbe's account of her visit to Athens. Miss Cobbe is eminent both as a writer and a thinker, and on the present occasion she has contrived to associate pleasant and graphic descriptions of travel with quiet and deep reflections on the essential characteristics of Hellenic sentiment, as contrasted with that of the modern world. Mr. Bicknell Prew's politico-economical essay is exactly the reverse of this contributed by Mr. Ruskin last month—that is to say, it is very practical, and very dry. There are two papers on Ireland—one in verse, being the continuation of "Lawrence Bloomfield," which, after a long hybernation, seems to have wrapped itself in a chrysalis like virtuoso. The other, "A Fortnight in Ireland in the Lent of 1863," contains not one word about the political or social condition of the country, but a very great deal about bacilnas, smuttalidh, onion sauce, golden plovers, and potsen, on which latter subject the author sagaciously remarks, "It is a noteworthy fact that Englishmen, temporarily travelling or located in Ireland, become exceedingly fond of this pet national tipple." It would be well if many others were to say the same. The not. "Late Laurels" is continued very pleasantly, and gives promise of becoming a very interesting story. It should have been called "The Golden Apples," as the subject appears to be a battle among three young ladies for one young gentleman. A good story is told of a repartee of a Jewish capitalist to the discontented subscribers to a loan brought out by him. "It cost," cried one of them, "more than we reckon, Mendoza, for religion m'en defend!"

Blackwood is solid and useful, but in nowise brilliant. There is an interesting memoir of the late Sir Howard Douglas, and two very good and judicious articles—"The Historic Muse" and "Ancient Landscape." The political articles are dull. "My American Investment" is a sort of pendant to the renowned "Glenmutchkin Railway," and equally dull and stupid. But in a very imperfective failure, for, in the former instance, the rogues told the story gleefully, and there was a sort of fun in the knavery, which made it a work of difference. The fiction is, in fact, less piquant than the reality, as it is more elaborate and less natural and spontaneous.

The readers of the Cornhill will not be disappointed in this month's instalment of the Roundabout papers which constitutes the principal attraction where all is excellent. Mr. Thackeray's new resemblance between the plots of these remarkable fictions, each burning upon the unworthiness of a many phase of human circumstances, and the ingenuity with which a confiding woman has been induced to intrust her happiness. Of course the dissimilarity of scene and circumstance renders the resemblance trifling, unlikely, and, if the authoress of "Romola" has been as successful in catching the spirit of the fifteenth century in Florence as Mrs. Gaskell at the nineteenth, her story must be as unique among historical novels for truth of representation as for breadth of culture and knowledge of the human heart. Mr. Lewes's "Study of Shakespeare" is a study where knowledge lies baseness to his friend is perfectly marvellous for its ponderousness and unlikeliness. Mr. Ruskin's "Sesame and Lilies" is for the moralist to analyse the characters of the respective bêtes noires of these novels, and to explain why Mrs. Malone, a much blacker villain than Orsbine, is so much more tolerable. There can be no doubt of the fact. The authoress of "Romola" is welcome to hang her man, if she likes; but when she makes a heroine of poetical justice, there was to be kicked, which ignominious doom bids fair to befall poor Orsbine very speedily, to the satisfaction of the most part of the readers. Not less interesting of the other contributions is the paper on "Prison Life," stated to be mainly derived from the revelations of the convicts themselves, and which certainly are to discover why imprisonment has not lost its terrors. If all we are told be true, some of the gaolers might change places with the prisoners with no inconsiderable advantage to society. "Chess" and "From Yeddo to London" are two capital papers of the light kind. "The Sunken Rocks" of Macmillan's is a reminiscence of the latte de cachet system, reminding us in some respects of the Revolutionary case now pending at Barcelona. The essays on "Babies" and "Skeletons" are not ethical but scientific, the former recording some simple and ingenious observations on German physician on the development of sensation in newborn children; the other finely and philosophically writing on the connection of the skeleton system of thought. The tribute to the memory of Sir James Outram will be perused with great interest. It is cordial, eloquent, and manly. It has never been at all justified in his anticipation of the moral effect to be wrought upon the Westminster boy who attended the funeral of the Indian warrior, but we should soon have an opportunity of witnessing the obsequies of some distinguished scholar, whose example may shame them out of the present position of the Abbey as the Hall of public schools.

Less acceptable to the general reader than the Cornhill, Macmillan maintains a higher intellectual standard. "Sunken Rocks" affords a curious parallel to "Romola," both in so far as it turns upon the infelicity of domestic life with a great but baby of political and historical detail which accompanies, without incumbering, the main action. We learn from Signor Rudio, that Savonarola and we learn it pleasantly as well as thoroughly. The paper on "Neapolitan Revolutions" is the benefit of the recent change of government are extended to the very thieves, and effectually extinguishes poor Mr. Bishop's claims to martyrdom. The article on Servia is a valuable one, and a series which is doing much to enlighten the public mind respecting the conditions of a problem which is becoming more interesting every day. The discussion of popular credulity in "Babel" might advantageously have been made better and sharper. Mr. Farrer's "Errors of Revolutionary Theories" whether he had known certain literary friends of mine in London, who, I know, have the vague notion that Mr. Lincoln has come or other the inquiry did not appear a pleasant one, and Mr. Foster put a stop to it by a decision of "Not proven." I am sorry that no acquaintance did not lie among that class. Perhaps you, Sir, were acquainted with my intimate friend, the Duke and Duchess of Lincoln?" Mr. Farrer's paper was suppressed. Other proceeded to explain how it was that half the British aristocracy were seekers after spiritual light.

The Victoria Magazine, a new candidate for public favour, fully merits success. It is conducted on principles of liberality and truth; the presentiment that it is destined to address a comparatively limited circle, but this is sure to be composed of cultivated and discriminating readers. The articles are all by ladies, a number are contributed by writers of mark; if, at least, we are justified in ascribing the introductory address to her Majesty's pen. The first number is good, it certainly results, though not altogether in his happiest vein. Mr. Dacey runs lightly over the leading features of his experience of American society; Mr. Senior contributes some interesting reminiscences of Egypt; and Mr. Meredith Townsend a really valuable paper on the moral influence of an East Indian residence upon English women. Better for the mind than the heart is the verdict upon the whole. Miss Rossetti's lines on L. E. L. are pathetic and melodious, nor would they have elicited the hint we have often felt inclined to give this admirable poetess, that she has now acquired a position which entitles her to feel jealous of her perfection. "Lindisfarne Chase" is more than that Mr. T. A. Trollope cannot be original off his own Tuscan ground.

Transplanted to England, he cannot forget his "big brother;" neither can we.

The contents of the Dublin University are varied and excellent. "The Land of the Princess" treats a subject of universal interest in the most satisfactory manner; it is a repertory of agreeable information. "Manon" is a romantic and striking, though somewhat sketchy, story; and the serial fiction, "Bella Donna" is developing at least its elements of power. Sterne's biographer pursues his task in his accustomed genial spirit, in which the paper on Montaigne participates; nor can any fault be found with Dr. Irwin's essay on Catullus, except the disgraceful typographical blunders in the quotations—a besetting sin of this periodical.

Good Words, as always, full of good reading. The Churchman's Family Magazine appears to be taking this journal for a model, but has much to do before it attains its level. It has too little matter extant, and the other contents are of too denominational a character for wide popularity. The gorgeous cover of Aunt Judy's Magazine sends an amusing notice about flowers, boat-races, dogs, flirtations, and a gentleman who travelled by the underground railway, and saw a young lady with a nasty resembling "an electrified cat."

MUSIC.

The principal occurrences of the week connected with the Italian theatres have been the production of Signor Schira's new opera, "Nicola de Lapi," at Her Majesty's Theatre, on Thursday last; and the first appearance this season of the captivating Adelina Patti at the Royal Italian Opera on the same evening. The introduction of Schira's opera at the one house, and the reception of the fair prima donna at the other, we shall speak of in our next.

Mlle. Trebelli, the charming contralto, who was so great a favourite last season, reappeared at Her Majesty's Theatre on Tuesday evening, in the character of Rosina, in the "Barbiere di Siviglia." She was more charming than ever, and her return was welcomed with enthusiasm. Her Rosina may be described as a perfect performance, both as regards acting and singing; and she has this advantage, which, indeed, also shares with her, that, with the exception of a slight voice, she sings the music as the composer wrote it—a thing which the generality of Rosinas, being sopranos, are unable to do.

Tamberlik has appeared this week in the Overture to "Guglielmo Tell;" and Mario is to appear this evening in the "Barbiere di Siviglia." There will now be no lack of tenors this season.

The commencement of the tenth season of the Crystal Palace was inaugurated on Friday, the 1st of this month, by a great May-Day Festival, consisting of a performance of the music composed by Mendelssohn for Racine's celebrated tragedy, "Athalie." This work, the last effort of the composer's genius, was first produced with a few months before his lamented death, had been made known in some degree to the English public by several performances at the Concerts, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall; but it was now produced on a scale of magnitude altogether unprecedented. The arrangements were undertaken by the Sacred Harmonic Society, and the performance was under the direction of Mr. Costa. The instrumental band comprised 196 violins and tenors, 30 violoncellos and double basses, 30 harps, and a due proportion of wind instruments. The chorus consisted of more than 2000 voices. Mr. Bartholomew was the organist; and Mr. Bartholomew's illustrative verses were recited by Mr. Phelps. This being a work well calculated for to suit a locality in the Crystal Palace, as it is made up almost wholly of choruses, without airs for solo voices, its effect was exceedingly grand, and, in some places, inexpressibly sublime; but still there were the imperfections which must ever attend such gigantic performances. The soft and delicate portions of the music were indistinctly heard. However, this defect left much to admire—much to be deeply impressed with. An immense multitude flocked to Sydenham on this occasion, and their enjoyment was enhanced by a day of bright sunshine, such as is seldom seen on an English 1st of May.

Mdme. Lind-Goldschmidt has made an addition to those numerous acts of beneficence which have distinguished her career and made the name of Jenny Lind a household word among the people of England. On Friday evening the 1st of May, a concert was given at St. James's Hall in aid of the Royal Hospital for Incurables at Putney, for which it was announced "Mr. and Mdme. Goldschmidt have kindly given their services." Unfortunately we were not enabled to taking part in the musical performances; for we understand that Mdme. Goldschmidt originated the concert, and bestowed much pains on its preparations and arrangements. The music consisted of Handel's celebrated cantata, "I'Allegro and Il Penseroso," a work full of the great composer's most beautiful inspirations. The solo parts were sung by Mdme. Goldschmidt, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss. The band and chorus were two hundred and fifty strong, and the performance was conducted by Mr. Goldschmidt. It was a treat not only rich but rare; for this exquisite music has not been heard in public for many years, and was probably quite unknown to the greatest part of the audience. Mdme. Goldschmidt sang without any diminution of her powers, and with that earnestness of expression which has always given her such a command over the feelings and hearts of her fair hearers. The other parts were admirably sustained by the eminent singers we have named, and, unhesitatingly, Handel's fine cantata was never heard to such advantage from his own day to the present. Though the prices of admission were unusually high, every part of the hall was crowded, and the Hospital for Incurables must have realised a great addition to its means of usefulness.

The Philharmonic Society's Concert of Monday last (the fourth of the season) was honoured with the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales, who came in Royal State, attended by a numerous and brilliant suite. The body-corporate of stalls were crowded to a degree we have seldom or never witnessed, several ladies having been seated out, overpowered by the heat, in the course of the evening. When the illustrious visitors entered the room they were received with cheers, while "God Save the Queen" and the Danish national air were magnificently played by the orchestra. The principal feature of the concert was the music composed by Beethoven for Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont," one of the most original and beautiful works, but hitherto almost unknown in England. It was superbly performed, having been rehearsed, and conducted with great care under the direction of Professor Bennett. There was also a magnificent performance of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; and Bennett's pianoforte concerto in F minor—a new movement by Mendelssohn was played most exquisitely by Arabella Goddard. The Royal visitors (the Princess especially, who is a fine amateur musician) seemed to enjoy the performance greatly, and both of them conversed affably with Dr. Bennett between the parts of the concert.

The last concert of Mr. Henry Leslie's choir, on Wednesday evening, April 29, was composed of very miscellaneous music. Samuel Webbe's motet, "In exitu Israel," and Mendelssohn's psalm, "Why rage the heathen," were the only pieces of sacred music performed. The chief secular pieces were Bishop's well-known "Trump, Love," Elliot's glee, "Come, see what pleasures," Macfarren's part-song, "When roses bud," and Miss Alice Mary Smith's part-song, "The Dream." This last, now heard for the first time, is the admirable production of the lady who is also a very gifted composer. The entertainment was varied (as usual) by solos on the pianoforte, played by Mr. Charles Hallé.

A series of three performances of classical instrumental music has been commenced by Mr. Deacon, one of our most accomplished pianists. The first was given, on Tuesday evening, Rooms in Grosvenor-street, on Thursday, the 30th of April, and attracted a large audience. Mr. Deacon himself took the piano, and was assisted by Messrs. Stanton and Pollitzer on the violin, Messrs. Webb and Clement on the viola, Signor Fenn on the violoncello, judicious, and the performance most successful. Mr. Deacon played Beethoven's sonata in G, from op. 2, one of the earliest and most beautiful of his works; also, with M. Sainton, Mozart's sonata in B flat, for the piano and violin; and a selection from Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte." The concerted pieces were Spohr's quartet in E minor, and Bertini's septet in E flat, a beautiful specimen of a composer too much neglected in this country.

An interesting soirée musicale took place on Friday last week at the house of Mdme. Leupold, in Westbourne-terrace, when the whole of the music of Mr. Aguilar's MS. opera, "The Wave King," was sung, and greatly delighted a numerous and highly-musical assemblage. The solo parts were ably sustained by Miss Eleanor Wilkinson, Mdlle. Emily Spiller, Messrs. Maxwell Gaylor and Feend, tenors; and Mr. Penna, bass. The choruses were sung by a party of accomplished amateurs. This opera, founded on a romantic German legend, is a beautiful and interesting work; one of those productions of native composers which ought to be produced on our English opera stage.

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'.—This theatre is now under the exclusive management of Mr. George Vining, who commenced his sole conduct of it on Monday, with the reappearance of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, on their engagement for eleven nights previous to their departure for Australia. The house overflowed with an admiring audience, that listened to the tragedy of "Hamlet" with the deepest attention. Mr. Kean's performance of the melancholy Dane has been so intimately identified with his fame that it would appear almost superfluous to venture any critical remarks on the manner of his representation. But the interest naturally attendant on the departure of two great actors such as Mr. and Mrs. Kean can scarcely be felt more than once in a lifetime; so long a period of time, produces an occasion for more than usual remark. The part of Hamlet is one so significant in itself as a poetical creation, and of such importance as a histrionic exercise, that criticism can scarcely ever be exhausted in its efforts to detect its beauties and penetrate its subtle meanings. Of all the interpreters of this unrivalled dramatic character Mr. Kean is not only one of the best, but decidedly the most brilliant. The resources of his elocution are ample, and he draws on them to the full, imparting infinite variety to the tone and gesture, and scattering his emphases with a judicious reference to the most effective delivery of the particular passage, while his eye quickens his features with a sort of supernatural light that gives to his countenance that air of inspiration which always betokens the presence of genius. His attitudes, always poetical, are frequently striking as well as appropriate, and the result of studious reflection. In bursts of passion and declamation Mr. Kean is without a rival, and perhaps equal now to what his father was, facility of practice having produced spontaneous development and removed every trace of imitation. Mr. Kean is now the most original actor on the stage, as well as the most marked, having a style of his own—a mannerism, if you please—by which he is individually distinguished, and which secures to him a sphere of action in which he stands unapproachable and alone. A more effective piece of acting than Mr. Kean's Hamlet is not to be named, except his Louis XI. The manner in which Mrs. Kean supports the character of Gertrude is also a specialty in the performance of this great tragedy, and gives a value to it possessed by none other. Mrs. Kean elevates it to a position which it ought always to occupy, but which is seldom accorded. On Tuesday the tragedy of "Othello" was performed, and scored the greatest applause. This is a part in which Mr. Kean is not so well suited for as the London public but it is not the less one of his greatest assumptions. It may be noted for its intensity, its fervour, and its picturesqueness. It is replete with poetic beauty, and even in its later scenes achieves the sublime. Henceforward, when years shall have elapsed since the first opening, it will rank among his loftiest efforts. On his return from Australia we shall hope to welcome him in it frequently; for to say the least of it, it is a grand specimen of histrionic art. And so for awhile we bid farewell to the greatest of our living Shaksperean actors.

GREAT FIRE AT YORK.

Our last Number contained a brief account of a fire, involving the loss of some valuable property, which occurred at York on Saturday week, and we now give an Engraving of the scene of the disaster. Shortly after ten o'clock on the evening in question smoke issuing from the back premises of Messrs. Clarke, Blenkiede, and Ball, who carry on an extensive drug business in Colliergate, and flames soon afterwards burst from the roof. The whole pile of buildings was quickly in flames. The three York engines were brought to the spot, but there was some delay before they could be got to work. As there seemed to be no chance of saving the premises of Messrs. Clarke and Co., the efforts of the firemen were principally directed to the preservation of the surrounding buildings. Notwithstanding all their exertions, however, the fire gradually made way, first to the offices of Messrs. Clarke and Co., which front the street, thence communicating with the premises recently occupied by Mr. Postill, organ builder; those of Mr. Sharp, pawnbroker; Mr. Plummer, surgeon; and the Wesleyan Centenary Schools. The schools were soon destroyed, little more than the bare walls being left standing. The premises of Mr. Postill and Mr. Sharp were likewise in flames, and the fire assumed such alarming proportions that a telegram was forwarded for the Leeds and Hull engines. In the meantime the fire brigade received an accession of strength in the shape of an engine belonging to the North-Eastern Railway Company, and another engine which was accompanied from the barracks by a troop of the 16th Lancers, who worked the engines and assisted the police to keep the street clear of the crowd. The flames at length began to succumb, and by about eight o'clock all danger of their further spreading was at an end. Nevertheless, the engines were kept working for some time afterwards, and they were occasionally used throughout the day to prevent any further serious outbreak. Three engines from Leeds arrived during the morning, but the fire had been so far subdued that their services were not then required. The damage done by the fire is supposed to exceed £10,000. Messrs. Clarke and Co. are by far the greatest sufferers, although they were heavily insured.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE ATTACK ON CHARLESTON.

THE unsuccessful attempt on Charleston by the Federal iron-clad vessels to recapture the town Sebastian in this journal does not be necessary to give more than a few particulars of the fleet's advance, in relation to which we have an Engraving on the preceding page. "The attack," says the correspondent of the New York Herald, "would have commenced an hour or two earlier than it did had it not been that the Admiral was anxious to wait for the ebb tide, rather than sail up with the flood tide, as the former would be more apt to lessen the difficulty of the obstructions in the channel; and the tide turned at eleven o'clock. During three hours of suspense the eye had an opportunity to take the features of the scene on which the great act was to be played. The blue waters danced in the bright sunshine, and flocks of sea-birds dipped their white wings in the waves and uttered shrill cries as they swooped downward after their prey. Over the parapets of Forts Sumter and Moultrie the black muzzles of heavy guns were discernible, and signalising them; and even on the roofs and steeples of the distant city were visible many persons who had climbed there to see the numerous batteries extending from the Wappoo Creek on the Ashley River, along the contour of James Island down to the lighthouse Battery, on the south point of Morris Island. Here and there also there were more numerous still. Breach Inlet Battery, on the lower end of Sullivan's Island, Fort Beauregard, and on up to Fort Moultrie; while in the centre of the picture, rising as it were from the water, stood Fort Sumter, displaying the rebel flag on one angle and the palmetto flag on the opposite angle; and beyond, Fort Sumter and Castle Pinckney, the city filling up the background. Meanwhile the attacking vessels lay at anchor in the main ship channel, within a mile of the batteries on Morris Island, without provoking a hostile shot. They lay in the order named in the plan of attack, as follows:—The Weehawken, Passaic, Montauk, Patapsco, New Ironsides, Ketokid, Nantucket, Nahant, and Keokuk. Five ships were in reserve. At half-past twelve the fleet commenced to move. The distance to the positions at which they were directed to attack was nearly four miles, and for about half that distance they were within range of the enemy's batteries. But again there was a delay. Grappling-irons attached to the Weehawken had got foul of her anchor-cable, and it took nearly an hour to set matters right. At last the difficulty was got over, and once more the vessels were under way. Slowly they moved up the ship channel. They passed within easy range of Fort Wagner on Morris Island, but not a shot disputed their progress; they passed the battery at Cumming's Point, named, I believe, Battery Bee, but still not a discharge from a rebel gun. And it was not till the vessels had got fairly between the two strong points of Morris Island and Sullivan's Island, which are about a mile apart, and were rounding to make the entrance of the harbour, that the ominous stillness was broken. Fort Sumter opened the ball with her barbette guns; Fort Moultrie took up the loud refrain. The various batteries joined in the chorus, and the circle of fire around the fleet enclosed within a circle of fire, concentrated from all the rebel guns that could be brought to bear upon the point." Our Engraving shows the iron-clad frigate New Ironsides and two of the Ericsson batteries replying to the enemy with the thunder of their huge batteries.

The Charleston Mercury sums up the casualties and damage sustained by the fleets in Charleston Harbour in the recent battle of ironclads against stone walls as follows:—

> The enemy fired about eighty shots—mostly 15-inch and steel-pointed shells—at Fort Sumter. The solitary casualty was made from one shell only. Forty only struck the work. One 15-inch gun was temporarily disabled by a shot; one columbiad, of 42 pattern, burst; one 7-inch rifled gun was dismounted by recoil; and one gun was disabled for a few moments by fracture of the muzzle-sight by recoil. Only one person was killed in Fort Sumter on the day we refer to. Sergeant Faulkner and Privates Chaplin, Minnis, and Penn, company B, were injured, the two latter severely, by stones which were dislodged by a large shot of the enemy. A drummer-boy, Ahrens, was struck by a piece of shell during the engagement. Over the parade, the flagstaff was also wounded. The regimental ensign was pierced near the centre by a ball. The Ironsides was struck by a 15-inch shell, which was but one casualty at Fort Moultrie. A shot from one of the Monitors cut away the flagstaff a few feet above the parapet, and the staff fell upon Private Lusby, Company F, 1st S.C. (regular) Infantry, inflicting injuries from the effects of which he soon died. The other casualties at Fort Moultrie, by the explosion of shells, were slight. Only a few shots from the enemy, but was not in any way injured, nor were there any casualties amongst the men. The Beauregard Battery, with three of its guns, also took part in a general melee of heavy artillery, and twice received a broadside from the enemy. The only casualty was a slight contusion. Many of the Yankee round shot fell upon the sand in the immediate neighbourhood.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1203.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1863. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

SOUTHERN ITALY.

SUPPOSE the case of a landowner whom circumstances, no matter what, have induced to annex to his own small but well-cultivated estate five or six others differing considerably from it and from each other, not only in extent but in the quality of the soil, the nature of its productions, and the mode in which it has been previously farmed. Suppose the last addition made to his domain, nearly as large as the whole of the rest of his possessions, to have been neglected for centuries, to be undrained, ill-cleared, and overgrown with rubbish. On what principles would it be fair for neighbouring landowners to judge whether any gain worth speaking of had been achieved in consequence of this amalgamation of several estates into one, and of subjecting them all to the same supervision and management? Would they expect at the close of one or two seasons, a perfect assimilation of that which had been, time out of mind, the worst cultivated land in the district, to that which had been the best? Would they feel justified in declaring the experiment to have failed, because, after so brief a period of trial, they might be able to point out in the former, extensive swamps not yet subdued, acres of good soil still overrun with weeds, and not a few appearances of disorder which no effort had yet succeeded in removing? If they should find that, on the whole, the crops raised from that portion of the estate were somewhat better both as to quantity and quality than they had been used to be, that measures were in progress to drain the more marshy districts, and means were being resorted to—rough means it may be—to clear the soil of weeds—would they not deem themselves bound in justice, if not to acknowledge the propriety of the change, at least to forbear publishing to the whole world a hasty but decided condemnation of it?

We think the state of Southern Italy should be looked at in some such spirit of reasonable allowance as, in the foregoing illustration, most men would assume to be indispensable to a fair judgment. The first and most necessary step to be taken is to withdraw the whole question at issue from within the range of party politics. It is certain that materials enough can be obtained to give plausibility to a foregone conclusion, on which side soever that conclusion may lie. But it is not the habit of educated Englishmen (or we have flattered ourselves into an unfounded belief) to confound the judicial functions with those of the advocate, nor to accept ex parte statements as a safe and sufficiently broad basis on which to rest a momentous decision. They can witness with as keen a zest as most men an intellectual conflict, whether in Parliament or elsewhere. They know as well as most how to appreciate a brilliant hit, a happy retort, an adroit evasion, a polished sarcasm, or a powerful appeal. But, after all, when required to come to a practical judgment in a controverted case they are wont to set aside all merely rhetorical garniture as calculated to mislead, to marshal all the known facts, to compare them one with another, and by the light of some great principle in which experience has taught them to place implicit confidence, to ascertain, not what they would wish to be the state of the case, but what it actually is. This is the temper in which we fancy they will be disposed to look at the present condition of Southern Italy, and upon the bearing which that condition may be supposed to have upon the experiment of Italian unity and freedom. Their instincts are too sober and too powerfully operative to admit of their being led far astray by the recent debate on this subject in the House of Commons; and, when they have read all that has been said on both sides of the question, we are pretty sure they will feel that a judgment unfavourable to a single and undivided kingdom of Italy, even were it sustained by a present preponderance of evidence, must of necessity be premature.

Two or three facts stand out of the mass with considerable, and, as it appears to us, with significant prominence. The foremost of these is the increase of trade, not in Italy merely, regarded as a whole, but in what once constituted the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. It is calculated upon authentic data that the trade of Naples with the rest of the world has increased fivefold, and still makes progress. True, the latest return of the Board of Trade shows an immediate diminution of her commerce with England in 1862, as compared with 1861. But any one conversant with the peculiar circumstances which affected British trade last year will find an obvious explanation in the fact, without reference to the political disquiet of Naples. And this increased activity of trade, not an unimportant item in itself and fer its own sake, is indicative of ameliorations of far more vital moment. It shows elasticity in the spirit of the people. Greater enterprise proves greater confidence. The weight of misgovernment would seem to have been so far eased under the sway of Victor Emmanuel as to give freer play than before to the industrial energies of the people. So far we are warranted in drawing the inference that, even in Southern Italy, the changes which have taken place have ministered to, rather than abated from, the development and fulness of national life. Then, again, it is incontestable that, within the last two years, public works of a highly useful and even remunerative character have not only been planned but set in actual process of construction. Schools, both elementary and of the higher kind, have been opened for the instruction of the people in every district. The lazzaroni have, for the time being at least, all but disappeared. The swarms of beggars which so tormented every stranger are dispersed; and the camôrra, a secret society of ancient standing, which preyed upon the fears of the timid and levied black mail upon almost all classes who had anything to lose, has been vigorously grappled with and substantially broken up.

The case, however, has its darker side, and the Government of the Kingdom of Italy must be debited with facts that lest friends lament, as well as credited with those which they can cite with satisfaction. It cannot be denied that the gaols in Southern Italy are overcrowded with prisoners—that little or no distinction is ordinarily made between those who are confined for criminal and those for political offences—that both classes of prisoners are detained an unreasonably protracted period before being brought to trial—and that brigandage is rife in most parts of the Neapolitan territory—that terrible severities have occasionally been inflicted by the military—that the burden of taxation is heavier than it used to be—that arbitrary arrests are frequently made, and that the constitution of the realm is sometimes violated. Such evils, however they may be explained, cannot be made light of. They show a state of society which, if there were any reason to believe would become normal and permanent, might be regarded by many as balancing all the advantages accruing to the country by the change of rulers. Indeed, it could not exist for long without bringing utter discredit on the Italian Government, nor without exposing to more serious danger than any through which they have hitherto had to pass the unity, independence, and freedom of Italy.

That we may not judge unfairly we have to keep steadily in view three or four considerations which somewhat alter the aspect of the case. Several of the grievances of which we have made mention are, if we may be permitted to use the expression, aboriginal. They did not come in with the new régime. They are not the offspring of the revolution. Unhappily, they are but aggravations of ingrained habits, and they draw their vitality and strength rather from a foregoing system of public administration than from any innovation into the province by a new dynasty. It must be conceded, moreover, that the times are exceptional. The Government of the kingdom of Italy has not yet been wholly at liberty to bring to completion the internal reforms which it admits to be needed. It has been partly diverted by the national anxiety to obtain possession of Rome and Venetia. It has been busy in organising an army and a navy. It has had to encounter hot party contentions. The Bourbon system left a host of corrupt, selfish, and intriguing officials on its hands. Its difficulties have been countless in number, and quite abnormal in kind. And, then, it has to be remembered that, even if the ills of which the Neapolitans complain differ little in their pressure from those under which they groaned before they had effected their deliverance, there is at least this difference with regard to the light in which they are viewed by authority—that under the old dynasty they flourished beneath administrative sanctions, while under the new they are marked for extirpation as early as possible.

All these things being fairly taken into account, we see no sufficient reason for concluding that the unity of Italy cannot prove lasting, or that the south is incapable of amalgamation with the north. If it really be so, much more convincing proof of the fact than any which has yet appeared will be required to satisfy candid minds. Hitherto, the balance of evidence inclines the other way. The wonder is, not that so much still remains to be done, but that in the face of so many obstacles any progress has been made. The direction has been effected. We know not that a little adverse criticism will be injurious in its influence upon the Italian Government, but we do think that they who labour to disheaten it in this its time of trial act unwisely and unkindly. The British people, we are sure, are not the friends of that wrong. They are too well aware of the innumerable perils which invariably threaten the youthful days of national freedom to add to their number by sinister forebodings. They bear in mind the experience of their own forefathers, and would rather cheer than discourage a sister nation in her struggle to extricate herself from the effects of centuries of division and misrule. We trust they will yet have the gratification to witness the Government of Italy surmounting its worst difficulties, and, by the consolidation and improvement of the various elements of subjects, preparing the way for the full realisation of their hopes—an undivided and unmutilated Italian kingdom, free in its institutions, independent in its policy, and having Rome as its capital.

A flag of distress, indicating a ship in danger, was hoisted on Monday night at the Rock Lighthouse, off New Brighton, near Liverpool. The tubular life-boat of the National Life-boat Institution stationed at that place immediately proceeded, in tow of the steam-tug Universe, to the scene of danger. The wind was blowing hard, and there was a heavy sea running. The life-boat succeeded, under perilous circumstances, in rescuing the crew of ten men of the brig Levant, of Bristol, inward bound from Barbadoes, which had struck on the North Bank, three or four miles from the mouth of the River Mersey. This life-boat has only been on this station a few months, and all the time he gave, in No. 187, on Beginning of the book.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Empress has been slightly indisposed, and an evening party which was to have taken place on Monday has been postponed in consequence until next Monday.

M. Chevreau, Lhuys, Rouher, Meunier, Siszvanne, Mocquard, Mentgue, and Germiny, and Generals Waldner, Macey, and Monge have been nominated to the rank of senators.

The sittings of the Corps Législatif were brought to a conclusion on Thursday week by a speech from the President, M. De Morny, thanking the members for the support they had afforded to the Government. In his allecting farewell address M. De Morny "wished that he could only say 'au revoir!" An early dissolution, however, of the Imperial decree, published yesterday week, formally dissolved the Chamber, and the 21st and 22nd of May have been fixed for the general elections in France, the 7th of June being appointed for those in Corsica. The Session of the Senate has also been declared at an end.

M. de Forcade has addressed a circular to the prefects explaining the principles by which they are to be guided in the approaching elections.

Considerable sensation has been created in Paris by the publication of the despatch from the French Government, sent to France, Russia and England, announcing that the contract to the Suez Canal Company cannot be sanctioned by the Porte unless on certain conditions, which have not yet been complied with. The French paper contains a communicated note, designed to allay the public alarm and to show that the French Government intends to leave the settlement of these important preliminary questions, but does not mean to interrupt the works.

The latest accounts from Puebla are very favourable to the French. After an active bombardment, continued from the 27th to the 31st of March, a general assault was effected, through which, by dint of hard fighting, the troops penetrated into the city, and fighting their way from House to House across barricades, succeeded in capturing the Plaza de Armas and the cathedral, and at the last accounts had nearly entire possession of the city.

The accounts from Cochin-China are also favourable to the French; a great number of villages had submitted, and order was restored.

ITALY.

A Cabinet Council was held on Tuesday at Aranjuez, under the presidency of the Queen. Her Majesty expressed to the Ministers the happiness it afforded her to see them constantly at the head of affairs.

King Ferdinand of Portugal has arrived at Madrid.

ITALY.

The Parliament has agreed to appoint a committee of inquiry into the general condition of the military and mercantile marine.

The Tuscan Chamber has voted the budget unanimously on the 17th. The King will assist at the ceremony.

The Queen left Florence this evening for Valletri. After a short tour his Holiness, it is expected, will return to Rome.

PRUSSIA.

A serious dispute has arisen between the Government and the Chamber of Deputies. At the sitting on Monday, the Minister of War, General Von Roon, was called to order by the President, for using unparliamentary language towards Herr Von Sybel. The Government members questioned the right of the President to interrupt a Minister while speaking, which led to a violent dispute, and ended in the President suspending the sitting. At the sitting on the following day a letter was read from the King, addressed to Herr Von Bennigsen, which supported the assumption of the President to limit the freedom of speech of the Ministers the latter would not attend the sittings of the Chamber. The King concluded his letter to a Special Committee, which has reported against the demand that the Ministers attending the Chamber should receive from the rules laid down by it the guidance of that body, and be wholly free of the control of the President.

DENMARK.

After three days' debate the Rigsraad, in its sitting of Tuesday, voted the address to the King by 57 votes to 28. The Government has declared its readiness to accept the resolutions.

GREECE.

A despatch from Athens of the 3rd inst., says—"The President of the Council, Mr. Bulgaris, has placed the Ministry at the disposal of resignations. The former will probably be succeeded by M. Christides. Warlike confidence is the prevailing feature of the day. King Otho demands six million drachmas for his private property."

TURKEY.

As a result, perhaps, of the Sultan's late visit to Egypt, a spirited despatch has been sent by Aali Pasha, the Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs, to the Representatives of the Sublime Porte at Paris and London, complaining of the Fenian movement across the Atlantic and the Isthmus of Suez.

It is reported from Ragusa that a conspiracy to massacre the Christians in Bosnia and the Herzegovina has been discovered in Mostar. Numerous arrests have taken place in consequence.

GREECE.

By the arrival of the steamer Edinburgh we are in possession of New York journals to the 2nd inst.

GENERAL NEWS.

General Hooker has at length commenced a movement upon the Confederate capital. On Monday, the 27th ult., a portion of the late army of the Potomac crossed the Rappahannock at Kelly's Ford, above Fredericksburg, and captured the Confederate pickets. Hooker is not out alone, but found an ally in Grant. Since that time the remainder of the army has crossed at three other fords, above and below Fredericksburg. The Confederates offered no serious resistance to the passage at any point. The Federals report the capture of from 500 to 600 prisoners. The Federal casualties do not exceed fifty in number.

On the 30th three corps of Hooker's army were twelve miles in the rear of Fredericksburg. The railroad was open to Aquia Creek, and the town, were in communication with the former. Another corps was threatening Gordonsville and under the command of Sedgwick. Confederates. General Stoneman's cavalry were on their way to destroy the lines of railway communicating with Richmond, so as to prevent General Lee from receiving reinforcements. Should Hooker obtain a great battle or a great catastrophe was imminent. General Hooker has been joined by General Milroy, at Fairmount, and destroyed the Baltimore and Ohio railway bridges at Fairmount and Cheat River.

It is reported that the Federal Monitor fleet is again inside Charleston Harbour, prepared for another attack on that place. The Confederate Secretary for War has visited Charleston and expressed himself satisfied with the precautions made by General Beauregard.

General Banks reports a series of successes in Louisiana. On the River Teche he had four engagements with the enemy and repulsed them, capturing 1500 prisoners. He forced the Confederates to destroy all their transports, and gained possession of many hundred head of cattle and much miscellaneous stores and provisions. Finally, he has seized the Opelousas Railroad and communicated with Admiral Farragut's fleet in Red River. In these operations he lost 500 men.

In south-western Missouri the Confederates have been active and gathered some booty, but have lost a whole regiment, with horses and camp equipage, which was surprised by the Federals.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The New York press generally considers that the action of Mr. Adams in giving a certificate to a vessel bound for Matamoras with arms for Mexico does not justify the severe comments of the British press thereupon, and thinks they prove the existence of a strong anti-American feeling in England ready to resent even the shadow of affront. Some journals justify Mr. Adams's conduct.

By order of the Privy Court, the cargo of the Peterhoff is being landed and examined, to ascertain if there is contraband of war on board.

Several Federal regiments whose time of enlistment had expired had arrived at Washington and New York to be mustered out. The Federal forces will lose thirty-seven regiments in this way during the present and next months.

The 30th of April was kept as a day of fast and humiliation by the people of the United States.

CANADA.

The trade and navigation returns of this province show that while no petroleum was exported in 1866, in 1867 there was sent out 69,880 gallons, and in 1868 1,764,140 gallons.

NOVA SCOTIA.

The bill abolishing manhood suffrage in this province was modified in the Upper House, so as not to take effect until after the next general election, so as to give the people an opportunity of giving a direct vote on this question.

CHINA.

The new organisation of the Ward force has caused dissatisfaction among the troops commanded by Li Hung Chang. Soochi was retaken. Tsen-Tsin have been repulsed by the Chinese troops. The rebels have evacuated Shaou Shing.

THE POLISH INSURRECTION.

The news from Poland is generally unfavourable to the Poles. The operations in the field for the past week, as far as they can be made out from the telegrams, have been as follow:—On the 4th the insurgent chief Bonitzs, with 800 men, attacked the Russian infantry near Mihrynow, but was defeated and taken prisoner. A sanguinary battle was fought on the 6th at Tepely, in the palatinate of Sandomir, between the Russians, numbering 3000 men, and the insurgents, under General Periorzanki, in which the Russians lost 400 killed and wounded, and the Poles 100. The Russians retreated to Tomanow. During the two previous days there had been partial encounters at Lumi and Zamch, the Russians manœuvring to surround the Poles, but they were forced to retreat, engagements are being fought, and beaten. The same day Miniewski suffered a defeat, with considerable loss, at Krzykawka, where Colonel Killed. By this time, it appears, Tarcanowski, reported to have been wounded and defeated on the 2nd inst., had recovered, as he is stated to have fought a battle on the 7th, at Kolin, in the palatinate of Kalisch, and, after two days' severe fighting, driven the Russians to Konin. However, on the 8th his luck again failed, as Colonel Von Berg, marching from Warsaw of the 9th—the band of Tecanowski, united with several others, was attacked near Pikol, north of Konin, and completely routed. The insurgents lost one cannon. On the same day a considerable force of insurgents from Galicia, commanded by Jordan, was defeated near Michalowice, on the road to Cracow, and thrown back across the frontier with heavy loss. Tecoranski's band was compelled to retire into Galicia. A sanguinary engagement took place on the 9th, at Tarnow, between side) on the 12th inst., in which the Russians are reported to have been the victors, although sustaining great loss.

The Provisional Committee of Warsaw is actively at work, and has also issued a proclamation denouncing Sachiowicius in Poland collecting taxes for the Russian Government.

LOSS OF THE ANGLO-SAXON.

The opening of the Atlantic cable has been attended with a fearful catastrophe. The Anglo-Saxon, the fine steamer of the screen, with more than 1000 persons on board, left Quebec on the 27th ult., bound for the port of Liverpool. She struck on the Cape Race, Newfoundland, and became a total wreck. Out of about 936 souls on board only 186 were saved. The boats had not been long cleared, a considerable number of the passengers and crew, had not been heard of at the latest date, in the hands of the natives on the coast of Ireland.

The following is a list of the cabin passengers:—Miss Malley; Hon. John Young, wife, seven children, and servant; Captain and Mrs. Bertram, wife's maid, and two servants. Captain Cassidy, Rev. C. F. Baton, Mrs. Wright, Captain T. F. Reed, Mr. C. Wright, Mr. Hamilton, S. Mill, Mr. C. Fraser, Mr. Curphey, Mr. Guy Pemberton, Mr. S. Rodgers, Mr. Fraser, Mr. Tenlby, Mrs. Jackson and child, Captain Bertram, Mrs. Bertram, Miss Bertram, and Mr. C. Mr. Greene (mail officer), Mr. Towers, the Rev. Mr. Eaton, Captain Cassidy, Mrs. Jackson and child, Mrs. S. Mill, Mrs. Reed, and Mrs. Wright, and Miss Jones, Catherine Cameron, Mary Ann Thomas, Mary Ann Adams, Edward Jones, and Thomas Calvert. The steerage passengers were the first, second, fourth seats, and about sixty others, were picked up in two boats by the Dauntless. Hopes are entertained that the steamer Arabia, and the Bloodhound have been dispatched to their assistance. The accounts, as may be supposed, are very conflicting. Another version says that 84 cabin passengers, 100 steerage passengers, and 21 of the crew were saved. The captain, part of the crew, and a great many passengers left the wreck on the first morning in the boats, and were all lost. Another version says that it has been ascertained that all the mails and 21 lives were lost by the Anglo-Saxon.

The following is the account of the loss of the Anglo-Saxon, furnished by the first officer of that vessel, Mr. Archibald, who left Liverpool on the 11th inst. at five p.m. She experienced strong westerly gales until Saturday, the 25th, when, at seven o'clock in the morning, with the sea a thick fog, the engines were immediately slowed. At ten p.m. the ice being thick and heavy, the engines were stopped altogether. A light was seen on the south forward, and ship ahead of us, being heard. At ten a.m. on the 26th the fog lifted, and the ice having cleared, we set the forecourse, and the engines were again occasionally at a dead slow. At half-past ten a.m. the fog closed away altogether, and we saw clear water to the west-north-west from the masthead. We steered for it, passing outside the ice. At two p.m. we were in the ship clear of ice, and steered north-west by west with full speed, and with all possible sail. A moderate breeze blowing from the south-west at this time. At noon, latitude 46°37, longitude 47°24 by the chronometer. At ten p.m. the breeze freshened, and the night setting in very thick weather, and a dense fog set in. We took in all sail at eight a.m. on the 27th. The fog continued to be dense. We continued the ship in the vicinity off Cape Race, we altered her course to west half north, and slowed the engines to half speed, which was continued until four a.m. on the 28th, when, on

THE MILITIA.

Four of the Middlesex regiments of militia—the Royal Leeden, the King's Own, the 1st (East) Middlesex, and the 3rd (Royal Victoria) Middlesex—were reviewed on Wednesday in Battersea and Clapham. His Royal Highness was accompanied by the Prince of Wales. The troops were brought on the ground in marching order from their barracks in the Royal enjoy three formed quarter-distance columns, wheeled into lines of contiguous columns the second and fourth companies moving to the front and wheeling into line, advanced and retired in echelon of battalions, and formed squares to receive cavalry. The Royal Leeden, the 1st (East) Middlesex, and companies, performed contiguous quarter-distance columns, and fired a Royal salute. At the conclusion of the manœuvres the troops marched past in review order, and really remarkable. The marching past and receiving cavalry were particularly brilliant, but from the inferiority of the ground, the firing of the battalion failed up the officers and briefly addressed them, emphatically expressing the pleasure which he had received from the efficiency of the various manœuvres, assuring them the men had surpassed his expectations, and that he was convinced that the country in time that could be required of them would not be able to perform readily. The Earl of Cardigan, the Marquis of Donegal, a number of officers, and a large concourse of spectators were present on the ground, which was admirably kept by four companies of the Guards.

The Queen's Own Light Infantry (2nd Tower Hamlets), 700 strong, was inspected last week by Major-General Sir Colin Campbell, K.C.B.

The West Kent Light Infantry Militia, numbering 800 men, was inspected on Monday by Sir Percy Herbert, who expressed their twenty-eight days' annual training, were on Wednesday inspected by Major-General Sutton, C.B., at Canterbury.

The 1st Royal Surrey Militia, mustering 750 rank and file, marched on Tuesday morning in Richmond Park, for inspection by Colonel Peyre of the Coldstream Guards.

The annual inspection of the Bucks Militia came off on Monday, on the Cricket Ground, at the desire of the Duke of Buckingham, Cricket, of the Coldstream Guards.

The 4th Royal Lancashire Militia, numbering upwards of 1,000 men, were inspected on Tuesday, by Colonel Wilkie.

The 6th Royal Lancashire Militia was inspected on Wednesday by Major-General Sir Thomas Wilkinson, K.C.B., Assistant Adjutant-General. The regiment mustered about 700 strong, and was under the command of Lieut.-Col. Townshend, of Wrexham.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

Lord Ranelagh has made arrangements for a grand brigade field-day, on Whit Monday, in Mr. Stode's beautiful park at Chaulhurst, and the Kent and Sussex Light Infantry Volunteers, and the 1st Middlesex Artillery on that occasion. Several corps have accepted the invitation.

The 1st Middlesex (Civil Service) Rifle Volunteer corps was held on Tuesday at the Orderly-room, Lancaster-place. The business of the regiment was of a routine character, and was over by half-past six o'clock. The corps that it still has sent to have upwards of 1000 effectives on its roll.

An antique and valuable silver tazza, presented by the Duke of Cambridge to the members of the Victoria Rifles, was shown to us at Harrow yesterday week. There was a numerous attendance, as it was the third and last day of the competition for the prizes presented by members of the battalion at Wimbledon this year. The Duke's gift fell to Mr. Doe, of the Grenadier company, who made 37 points out of a possible 40. Next to him came Sergeant Fuller and Mr. Hall coming in second and third. All these men have obtained places in Wimbledon this year, and will also enter for the bronze medal of Middlesex, and Mr. Fuller for the St. George's Challenge Vase.

A contest for the temporary possession of the Harrow trophy cup took place on Saturday last, between the 1st company of the 17th Middlesex (Barnet). This corps had held it successfully through the last few months, but on Saturday it was wrested from them by the Wembley (a that of the C Company of the Victoria Rifles.

The 1st Middlesex Artillery Volunteers carried on gun practice on Saturday last, for the first time this season, at the Tre-gun battery, Plumstead Marshes. The corps, which mustered 200 strong, with carriages, at a range of 1200 yards, under the superintendence of the Adjutant Captain Wilkinson. The practice commenced at eleven o'clock, and although had not fired shot or shell before, the shooting was good, the shots either striking the target or falling very near to it, and in a line with it.

On Saturday the volunteer campaign for the season in Lancashire was inaugurated by a contest, organised by the officers of the Liverpool Rifle Brigade, for the Earl of Derby's challenge cup and other prizes. The weather was fine, and trains from Liverpool, Manchester, and Stockport brought a numerous company of rifle volunteers together. The contest agreed with the Rifle St. Leger, open to all the world. Four prizes were offered of £20, £15, £10, and £5, and the challenge cup, as also the Derby cup, 1 shot at each range: Wimbledon scoring—hits and points added. Mr. Rawson, the winner of the Rifle St. Leger, was the winner of the Derby cup, with a total score of 99 marks. There were three ties at 76 marks for the second, third, and fourth prizes, which were decided by a shot each, and fell to Mr. Hall, Mr. Bibby, and Mr. Lloyd respectively. Captain Heaton made a centre, and, earning the fourth prize, reaped the double benefit of £5 and the cup for the best shot. Mr. Rawson, the winner of the Derby cup, made 99 points, and the next third time each competitor made a centre. The ties were decided by a shot each, which fell to Mr. Rawson, Mr. Bibby, and Mr. Lloyd. Mr. Hall and Mr. Mr. Ashton made a bull's-eye and Mr. Braill a centre. Mr. Ashton then scored

THE ROYAL ITALIAN STEAM-SHIP ESPLORATORE.

THIS vessel, the subject of our Engraving, made her trial-trip on Wednesday, the 6th inst., and her performances were attended with the most favourable results, having accomplished at the measured distance in Sea Reach an average speed of 17·278 knots per hour, one of the very fastest on record.

The Esploratore has been constructed and equipped for the Italian Government by Messrs. Money, Wigram, and Co., of Blackwall, and is the first completed of a class of ships intended for despatch or Royal steam-yachts. She is a noble and handsome steam paddle-ship of 1062 tons; her length 240 ft., 30 ft. beam, and 15 ft. depth of hold. Her engines, constructed by Messrs. Penn and Son, are of the collective power of 350 horses, on the oscillating principle. The cylinders are 71 inches in diameter, with a stroke of 5 feet; the number of revolutions on the trial was 40; the boilers are four in number, on the tubular plan, and fitted with brass tubes; the paddle-wheels are on the feathering principle, and fitted with disengaging apparatus.

The performance of the machinery was in every respect highly satisfactory, developing a very large indicated horse power, and from boilers not exceeding ordinary proportions.

THE BEGUM OF BHOPAL.

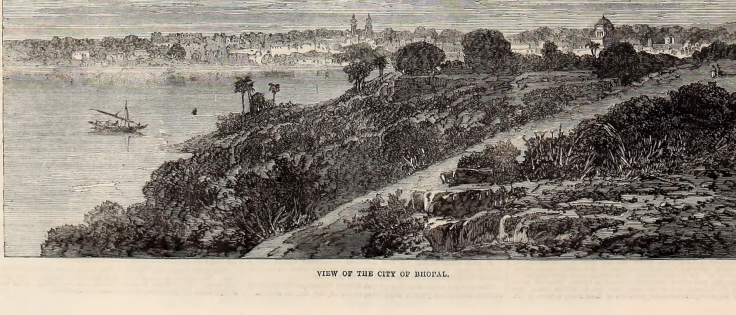
(From a Correspondent.)

HER Highness the Begum of Bhopal, K.S.I., is the only lady member of the Order of the Star of India, except of course her Majesty the Queen. The Portrait was taken of her in a dress worn on public occasions. It gives her a very pleasing and natural expression. The two men sitting with her are her Ministers. The one on the right, in the white dress, is Kian Ram, the Under Minister, and a Hindoo; and the one on the left is Jumal-oo Deen, the Prime Minister, and a Mussulman. The view of Bhopal is taken from the south side of the lake. On the occasion of the Agent of the Governor-General's durbar at Bhopal, Nov. 1, 1862, the first anniversary of the installation of the Knights of the Order of the Star of India, the Begum gave a series of magnificent entertainments, which lasted nine days.

It will suffice here to mention that the town of Bhopal is in Central India, between Saugor and Indore, on the Bombay road, and nearly equidistant from both places about 100 miles. It is a large fortified town, surrounded by a high loopholed wall. The town is built on a low hill between two tanks, one of which is about two miles long and a quarter of a mile wide, the other about five miles long and one mile wide. The palaces of the Begum and of her principal nobles overlook the larger tank. The town is very clean and well kept, and the streets are lighted with oil-lamps after dark, and in this respect Bhopal contrasts very favourably with most native towns, which are generally filthily dirty and never lighted. The population is chiefly Mussulman; but a great number of Hindoos live in the town and are treated in all respects as well as the Mussulmans. The present ruler of the Bhopal State, her Highness the Nawab Secunder Begum, is the daughter of the late Nawab Nuzzer Mahomed Khan.

HER HIGHNESS THE BEGUM OF BHOPAL.

She married her cousin, the late Jehangir Mahomed Khan. After his death she succeeded him, with the consent of the British authorities, and has proved one of the wisest and most able rulers of the country. The reigning family at Bhopal have always been attached to the British; and when the mutiny broke out she remained firm in her attachment to the English cause in spite of the wishes and entreaties of her intimate friends and relations and the threats of her Musulman adherents. She stood alone in our favour at that trying time, and had the wisdom and foresight to know that in the end we must be the conquerors. Whatever assistance she could give us, she gave willingly. In 1860, after the country was settled, the late Lord Canning assembled all the chiefs of Central India at Jubbulpore, and in open durbar there praised the Begum for the noble way in which she had stood out in our favour, and at the same time informed her that he had been empowered to give her a grant of land worth about a lac of rupees a year. The Begum was greatly affected on this occasion, and with tears of joy in her eyes stood up and thanked his Lordship for the great honour she had received. On her way back from Jubbulpore, as she was crossing the noble iron suspension bridge over the Bean, eleven miles from Saugor (built by a former Commissioner of Saugor, from iron made on the spot, from the ore found in the neighbourhood, with ordinary native tools, and by unskilled workmen, and at a place where no foundries exist), she said, "of what use is it to fight against people who can build a bridge like this?" She is now firmly attached to the English. To her great regret, she only knows a few words of the English language; but her daughter was taught it a little, and her grand-daughter is learning it regularly. Her troops are neatly dressed, and well disciplined in the European fashion. She was delighted to receive the Order of the Star of India, and gave an entertainment on the occasion; and in last November, on the first anniversary of the installation, she gave a magnificent series of entertainments which lasted nine days, and for which she sent invitations to the European officers and ladies in all the neighbouring stations—Saugor, Lahore, Indore, &c.—to several of her more particular European friends in all parts of India, and also to all the neighbouring Princes. The Agent of the Governor-General for Central India was present, also the political agent for Bhopal, and several other members of the diplomatic corps, and several military and civil officers and ladies. Many more ladies would have been present had it not been for the heat of the weather and the unhealthy time of year. On the 30th of October the Begum went out in State to meet the Agent of the Governor-General, and to welcome him to her capital. This was a very pretty sight, and gave a good idea of what Eastern splendour must once have been. On the 1st of November the Agent of the Governor-General received a State visit from the Begum at the English camp in a suburb two miles from the city. After this the visitors paid visits to the Begum and her principal nobles in their palaces. In the evening the Begum gave a grand dinner in her palace, which was very tastefully illuminated: the most conspicuous devices in the illumination were two large well-executed transparencies of the insignia and motioes of the Star of India, while "Welcome" shone out in all directions. The lake, too, was illuminated with thousands of coloured lights, and after dinner there was a magnificent display of fireworks. Every evening either the Begum or her nobles gave an entertainment, and during the day cricket and other amusements were got up by the visitors. It must be mentioned that the Begum engaged a circus (no common thing out here) for the amusement of her guests. Everything was on the grandest scale; the guests all had meals together in a large house provided by the Begum for the convenience of travellers. The commissariat arrangements were on the most sumptuous scale, and there was a most plentiful supply of everything. The Begum is about forty-eight years old; she is a very amiable, sensible, and clever woman. She manages all her affairs, and does a great deal of her office work herself: she has had experience that her people are not to be trusted. She generally has an animated, pleasant expression, but a very determined look; and she is accustomed to have her own way and to have her orders fully carried out. It is greatly to be wished that there were a few more native rulers like her. It is hardly saying too much to say that in sagacity and power of managing she has no equal among the rulers of India.



VIEW OF THE CITY OF BHOPAL.

RAILWAYS IN THE SCOTTISH HIGHLANDS.

IT was only last Session that the Government grant in aid of the maintenance of "Highland Roads and Bridges" was discontinued. It is now more than a hundred years since the Government of the day saw that the only way of making the Scottish Highlands amenable to law and loyal to the Crown was to construct roads through all the disaffected districts. This was done, and, afterwards, Parliament voted £5000 a year for the proper maintenance of these roads, attaching, however, to the grant conditions which secured from the proprietors of land a very ample contribution to the same object. The money was well spent. There are, probably, no finer roads in the world than those which for nearly forty years have been under the management of the Government, and by their means the country has greatly prospered. Last year Parliament came to the conclusion that the Highlands should pay for their own roads; and not without reason, for property had increased immensely in value, and not only roads but railways flourished, yielding a higher dividend than many great lines in the heart of England.

Greater roads, however, than those which first subjugated the Highland clans are rapidly in progress, and promise to benefit the country even more largely. A continuous line of railway now connects the county of Ross; and railway schemes are ripe for execution which will bring the rivers, moors, and forests of Sutherland within twenty-four hours of London. On the 23rd ult. an extension of thirty-five miles beyond Inverness was successfully completed and opened for traffic. The country through which it passes will pleasingly surprise those whose notion of the region beyond the Grampians is the traditionary idea, imbibed by Gibbon, of gloomy hills assailed by the winter tempests, lakes concealed in a blue mist, and cold and lonely heaths over which the deer of the forest are chased by a troop of half-naked barbarians. The line of the Ross-shire railway is, in fact, as sunny, as pleasant, and as fertile as almost any district in the kingdom. It is rich in wheat-land, highly cultivated, and studded with townships and villages in which frugal men have realised fortunes. Three large navigable rivers flow through it, and at the mouth of each there is a wide area of champaign country, yielding a rent which is not exceeded except in the best parts of England and the Lothians. The extent of arable land is not, however, great; within some miles of most of the stations the tourist will find Highland scenery of the wildest and most romantic character. At every point the landscape is bounded by a noble panorama of hills on one side, and on the other, except for a few miles, by the sea.

Leaving Inverness, the railway crosses the river at the harbour of the town. The bridge, which we have engraved, is a very handsome structure of almost white stone, designed by Mr. Mitchell, the engineer of this and the other Highland railways. Owing to the loose nature of the soil, it was very difficult to get a good foundation—a difficulty experienced in a still greater degree at the construction of a suspension-bridge a little higher up the river, erected at the expense of Government. The latter, designed by the late Mr. Rendall, cost £30,000, besides the expense of purchasing some buildings and compensating persons who were injured by the progress of the works. The railway viaduct, a much more attractive structure, cost only £11,000. A few hundred yards further on, the line crosses the Great Caledonian Canal on an iron swing-bridge of 74 ft. span, and passes by a rocky promontory on the confines of the Fraser country, which was once the scene of a desperate clan fight. For nearly fourteen miles from this point almost all the land is in the possession of gentlemen bearing the name of Fraser, and of the head of the clan, Lord Lovat, whose seat is about three miles distant from the station at Beauly, or Beau-lieu, a pretty village on the banks of the river of the same name, which is crossed by a timber viaduct of 450 ft. long. Entering the county of Ross, we enter also the country of the Mackenzies, one of the most powerful of the Highland clans, and which played a distinguished part in the history of the North. The view from above Sir Kenneth Mackenzie's house, looking upon the great valley of the Conon, and the wooded slopes and rocky ridges which form a background for Brahan Castle, the residence of Lord Seaforth, is one of the finest in Scotland. The distant hills are of Lord Seaforth, is one of the finest in Scotland. The distant hills are peculiarly picturesque in outline and rich in colour, while the foreground is varied by woods and water, the former including some very handsome specimens of the old Scotch fir, gnarled like oaks, and of a glowing ruddy colour in the bark. Another great river has to be crossed, the Conon, famous in Celtic lore for the number of dread tales of second-sight, witches, and warlocks with which it is associated. The bridge is of stone, five arches of 77 ft. span, with a skew of 45° to the river. We understand that it was an engineering work of some delicacy to obtain the requisite angle by a series of rile of stone. Iron girders might have been adopted here, but, owing to the splendid stone adjacent, Mr. Mitchell, the engineer, adopted the principle of making each rib of each arch, in a manner, an independent bridge. The effect is very bold and graceful: the bridge is one of the finest stone structures in the north of England. A couple of miles further on is Dingwall, the county town of Ross-shire; it stands on a rich plain of considerable extent at the mouth of the Peffer or Pollury, which gives the name to a spa of considerable reputation a few miles distant. Beyond this we enter the country of the Munros and Rosses, both great names in Highland story. The railway skirts the shore nearly the whole way to Invergordon, a distance of nine miles and a half. The country is in high cultivation, and abounds in thriving villages. The terminus is the principal shipping-port of the county, and much traffic is expected in agricultural produce of all kinds. Comfortable inns exist in all parts of the country, and sport of every kind is abundant. A point nearly opposite Invergordon, on the coast of Moray, is supposed to have been the limit to which the Romans, under Severus, penetrated in Scotland.

Looking at the sea, it is said, the country appeared so wild, so stormy and desolate, that they resolved to penetrate no further, and there they planted their terminus. With the Romans, terminus was a god, usually represented without arms and legs, to show that he was immovable. The railway terminus is not as "stationary." It has already exceeded further south than the Roman eagles ever flew, and extensive preparations are now in progress to penetrate to the heart of Sutherland, to the village of Bonar Bridge. It is likely to stop till it reaches the utmost limit of the kingdom, for already the people of Caithness are bestirring themselves to know the rest of the extension to the town of Thurso, on the shores of the Pentland Firth.

The Vienna journals state that several cafés of that city have lately introduced a machine for chilling cards which performs the work with great celerity.

Captain the Prince of Leiningen, R.N., of her Majesty's yacht Victoria and Albert, has forwarded a £5 to the Royal Naval Institution, and has promised to subscribe £1 annually to the society.

The members of the Scarlett Harmonic Society have presented to J. R. Turle, Esq., a testimonial in recognition of his valuable services in connection with the several Handel festivals at the Crystal Palace, and the munificent generosity on the opening of the International Exhibition last year.

ROYAL DRAMATIC COLLEGE.—The annual general meeting of those interested in the prosperity of the Royal Dramatic College will take place on Wednesday, the 27th inst., at one o'clock, on the stage of the Adelphi Theatre. The Royal Dramatic College Fête and Fancy Fair, on a grander scale to take place, as usual, at the Crystal Palace, on Saturday, the 29th, and Monday, the 31st of July.

Statistics of the admissions to South Kensington Museum, during the period in which the visits of presents to the Prince and Princess of Wales remained on public view, may interest some of our readers. On five days (17,151 persons entered the building, making an average of 3,430 per day, a total of 20,425 visitors, exclusive of 2240 children. Out of this number, upwards of 10,000 passed through the barriers on the single day of the royal visit, 1849 guests of both Houses of Parliament and their friends availed themselves of the special invitations to private views. A number of the police and constables was employed to direct the movements of the crowd; and upwards of 25,000 lists of the presents were sold.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1863.

SHOULD it seem desirable to the authorities in France to divert the attention of the public from the mock elections fit is a pity that France has no Haydon) to some outlying subject, an excellent opportunity has been offered to the notice of those who suggest themes for articles in the journals. The Governments of France and England understand one another too well to feel anxiety lest any newspaper discussion should cause estrangement, and a little anti-English feeling might be stirred up without any particular detriment to the relations of the two countries. The Sultan has virtually stopped the Suez Canal. Who can be to blame in this matter but perfidious England, whose haughty Minister has always declared himself hostile to the scheme for the benefit of mankind in general and M. De Lesseps in particular? Though Mr. Kinglake's Great Ritchi is no longer at Constantinople, his mantle has fallen upon "Sir Bulwer," and that wily diplomatist did not go aboard the Padishah's vessel, under pretence of making to Fuad Pacha, a friendly communication, for nothing. The malignant Englishman's concluding words, hissed into the Sultan's ear, were, "Scrase De Lesseps!"

We have triumphed, according to the organs of the Salmagundites, but we must be satisfied that we have done so in the most graceful manner, and have disguised our subtle projects so effectively that no one would have found out that we had interfered at all if prestanatural acumen had not been brought to bear upon our evil designs. The Sultan, our accomplice, has acted with a dissimulation and duplicity worthy of Punic faith and frankness, that the world can see in him only a Sovereign who knows his duty towards an important part of his dominions, and who does it in open and patriotic fashion. It needs the cyclopean perspicacity with which our rulers can detect the secret agency by which his Majesty has been set in motion. It is true that the English Ambassador pretended not to see the necessity of the Sultan's costly expedition to Egypt; nay, in the baseness of dark hypocrisy, affected to think that his Majesty would do well to remain at Stamboul until the serious questions affecting his European provinces should be adjusted. But this was the well-known treachery of the British nation, which never speaks its true meaning. Mr. Roebuck declared that the Sultan should go, and knew well the errand on which his Majesty went. It is all very well for the coarse, loud-talking English press to spake of a monarch's wise resolve not to cede important districts to foreign settlers—keep that kind of hypocritical talk for your Houses of Commons, Leven Lesterr Square decides it. The Sultan has yielded to English influences; he has had Englishmen to make up the accounts of his empire; he has visited Smyrna to please the English engineers, to partake of their lunch, and to admire their railway carriages; and it is notorious to all the world that his Majesty partook of a costly and splendid description (English music, bah, my Heaven!) is now on its way to the seraglio. The same influences sent him to Egypt to work the destruction of the canal.

Doubtless, therefore, in the apparently wise and frank conduct of his Majesty Abdul Aziz in this affair we shall discover no extenuating circumstances, but rather additional proofs of British subtlety. That the Oriental mind is full of dissimulation is known, and here the brutal self-will of England acts through the artful adroitness of the Turk. The Sultan visits the Pacha, and, after a round of deceptive formalities, they go together, Abdul Aziz and Ismail Pacha, to gloat over the scene which they are about to end. They behold the magnificent scheme of M. De Lesseps on its way to triumphant fulfilment, and it is being industriously carried out by thousands of hardy Egyptians, who labour joyously (who dares say they give forced labour!), for they decay the prosperity of their country. The rulers look on with a malignant smile, and promise themselves to change all that. The Sultan departs, and in due course the result of his visit is shown in the atrocious despatch which has been rent to the representatives of France and of England—hollow mockery, as if Sir Bulwer had not dictated the document. O yes, it reads fairly enough. The Sultan has perceived that a large canal is being cut through his property, and he declines to let that work proceed unless he shall receive sufficient guarantee that certain persons who consider the Mediterranean a French lake will not claim that canal as a French ditch. He does not even claim it as his own, but simply demands its neutralisation. He further observes that its projectors claim the banks on each side, and also sundry important stations, which may be intended only for navigation works, but which could very easily be turned into a something far more important, and sometimes into a military point of view, would be invaluable. The Sultan cannot recognise this claim. And, finally, when his Majesty enjoyed that delightful view of the canal works, he was unable to see the special beauty of the system under which they were being carried on. He seemed to him that the vast army of labourers were by no means free-will workers, and that they would be much better employed in cultivating Egypt than in improving M. De Lesseps's prospects in the share-market. A Sultan who asks important questions is of course not to be answered as people are answered in French newspapers, and he can get at the truth by a very summary process—shorter even than logic. His Majesty learns that the fellahs are forced to come, 30,000 strong, to make this canal, and that these figures represent only one third of the labour which is being withdrawn from the soil of Egypt to the sand of Suez. The Padishah, therefore, intimates that forced labour shall absolutely cease. He apprises those whom it may concern that, until these conditions are assented to, the canal must stop. But he adds that, inasmuch as a good deal has been attempted, and as it was believed that this most improper and outrageous scheme would be permitted to be carried out, he will take the matter into his own hands, if the projectors like to receive pegging-out money. He proposes already to, and then the canal will be executed, if at all, for the Government, and not for M. De Lesseps.

The world will see nothing unfair in all this; on the contrary, the demands of the Sultan will be thought to be precisely those which a Sovereign should make, and his conciliatory proposal will seem to have been prompted by the spirit of justice. But we shall hear quite another story from the well-paid organs of M. De Lesseps. Palmerston has triumphed. And we expect, especially, that the following proposition will be hailed with shouts of scorn. The work is to be taken out of the hands of the French, of course; and to whose hands will it be committed? Why, to those of the English. It is true that they have discouraged the scheme, their Premier on political, and their engineers on commercial grounds; but they are now quite with the change of hands. Like the magic flute in Mozart's opera (where living music is wedded to dead words, à la Mexentius), the canal in one keeping produces evil, in another, good. The English will soon discover that if they can lay hold of it the difficulties will vanish, we shall hear no more of neutralisation, the canal will be the road to India, and once more perfidious Albion triumphs in the East. There! There is matter for fifty admirably sarcastic articles, and it will be the fault of the "Black Man" if our French friends concern themselves with the elections.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty, accompanied by the younger members of the Royal family, returned from Osborne House, Isle of Wight, on Friday, and yesterday (Friday) the Queen took her departure for Scotland. Her Majesty, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses Prince Alfred and Prince Leopold, and Princesses Helena, Louisa, and Beatrice, and attended by Lady Augusta Stanley, the Duke of Athole, Colonel Bouverie, Major-General Grey, and Miss Grey, Lord Charles Fitzroy, Dr. Jenner, Mr. Roland, Major Cowell, and Mr. Bell, left Windsor at ten minutes before eight o'clock a.m., by the Great Western Railway, which conveyed them to Banbury, where the train entered on the North-Western line, and proceeded to Rugby, at which station a relay was reached at seven minutes after four o'clock this morning. The train proceeded thence by the London and North-Western Railway till junction, from which point the Scottish Central line was traversed to Perth, where her Majesty was to arrive at 8.40 a.m. Here the Queen partook of refreshment, after which the Duke of Athole joining the train at this place and travelling onwards with the Queen to Balmoral, Aberfeldy, where the train will proceed by the Scottish North-Eastern line to Aberdeen, whence, after a delay of twenty minutes, the Royal party will proceed by the wards, over the Deeside Railway, to Aboyne, the terminus of the railway, her Majesty posting thenceforward to Balmoral by easy stages, the whole journey being performed without having accomplished in little more than twenty hours.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales attended Divine service on Sunday last in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The Bishop of London and the Bishop of Oxford officiated. On Monday the Prince and the Prince of Orange at the Palace Hotel. In the evening the Prince and Princess honoured the Duke and Duchess of Wellington with their company at dinner at Apsley House. In the evening crowds were invited to meet their Royal Highnesses. The Princess was attired in a dress composed of various upgrade ribbons with lace. On Wednesday the Prince and Princess visited the Royal Botanic Gardens. In the evening their Royal Highnesses honoured Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston with their presence at dinner at Cambridge House. Prince Alfred accompanied their Royal Highnesses. On Thursday Viscountess Palmerston received a distinguished circle invited to meet the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Duke of Cambridge and Princess Mary were among the early arrivals. On Thursday their Royal Highnesses again honoured the Royal Italian Opera with their presence.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales will hold a Drawing-room, on behalf of the Queen, this day (Saturday).

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess have accepted the invitation of the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London to be present at a ball at Guildhall on the 8th proximo.

THE LEVEE.

A Levée was held on Wednesday afternoon at St. James's Palace by the Prince of Wales on behalf of her Majesty.

His Royal Highness, escorted by a detachment of Life Guards, arrived from Marlborough House about two o'clock at St. James's Palace.

His Royal Highness Prince Alfred, his Royal Highness the Prince of Orange, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and his Serene Highness Prince Frederick of Holstein were present at the Levée.

The Princess of Wales entered the Throne-room, accompanied by Prince Alfred, the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Prince of Holstein. His Royal Highness was attended by the Earl of St. Germans, G.C.B., Lord Steward; Viscount Sydney, G.C.B., Lord Chamberlain; the Marquis of Abercorn, Master of the Horse; Viscount Jury, Treasurer of the Household; Major-General Grey, Vice-Chamberlain; and the other Lords and gentlemen of the Royal Household.

The presentations exceeded 600, and the Levée was numerously attended.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will honour Viscount and Viscountess Sydney with their company at a grand banquet on the 20th inst.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary, some of their relatives, and the Duke of Teck arrived from Cambridge Cottage, Kew, for the season.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange, travelling under the title of Count Von Buren, arrived in London on Wednesday. His Royal Highness is staying at Dorchester House.

Their Serene Highnesses Prince and Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar arrived at their residence in Portland-place on Thursday for the season.

The Duke and Duchess of Beaufort left town on Monday for Badminton for the season.

The Duke and Duchess of Manchester have arrived at their residence of Great Stanhope-street, from Kimbolton Castle, for the season.

The Earl of Montrose will return to Belgrave-square on Monday next from the Continent for the season.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster and Lady Theodore Grosvenor arrived at Eaton Hall on Monday from Holmwood House, Dorset.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Bath have arrived in town from Longleat, Wilts.

The Earl and Countess of Egerton arrived in town on Thursday from Tatton Park, Cheshire.

The Earl and Countess of Dunham have arrived at Upper Grosvenor-street, from Dunham Massey, Cheshire.

The Bishop of St. David's has arrived at Manrigy's Hotel from Abergwili Palace, near Carmarthen.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

Bishop Ellicott was enthroned in the cathedral at Bristol on Thursday week, when a very large attendance on the occasion.

The installation of Dean Hedrick took place at Exeter Cathedral on Thursday week.

The 250th anniversary festival of the Sons of the Clergy will be celebrated under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 21st inst.

The report of the Lower House of Convocation on the Bishop of Natal's case will be presented on Tuesday, the 26th inst.

Archdeacon Sinclair held a visitation of the archdeaconry of Middlesex, in his parish church of St. Paul, Covent-garden, on Monday. The charge related chiefly to the organisation of lukewarm churches.

The Rev. Thomas Auden, M.A., of St. John's College, Second Master of Archbishop Cranmer's Grammar-school, Canterbury, succeeds to the head-mastership of the Grammar School, Wellingborough, on the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Evans.

On Monday afternoon the distribution of the prizes to the students of the University of Durham at University College took place, under the presidency of Dr. Parker, F.R.S. Professor Sharpey (Dean) read the report, which referred to the progress the college is satisfactory terms.

A full meeting of the Senate and Convocation of the London University was held at Burlington House on Wednesday to confer degrees. Earl Granville, Chancellor of the University, presided, and a large number of graduates had been presented for their degrees, his Lordship spoke in terms of high praise of the University.

The Bishop of Exeter, who is in the eighty-fifth year of his age, held a confirmation at Exeter Cathedral on Monday. He addressed them in a short but touching speech, alluding to the fact that this was probably the last time he would appear among them, and to one and all he solemnly gave his blessing.

The promoters of the suit against Professor Jowett have abandoned the idea of applying for a commission de lunatico to be issued by their counsel (although there gentlemen do not approve of the judgment that such an application would have the prospect of success. The time for appealing has expired. It was likewise in their power to do—has long since been permitted to elapse, and the suit is therefore at an end.

A purse of forty sovereigns was presented, on the 7th inst., to the Rev. G. W. Allen, M.A., late curate of St. Mary-Magdalene, Oxford, by the Bishop of Exeter, to the rectory of Bridestowe, Devon. The presentation took place at the palace, and was made on the purchase of a new altar for Bridestowe Church, where the chancel is sadly in need of a thorough restoration. The children and old people of the parish on the same occasion made a farewell offering of affection to the curate of Mr. Allen.

The annual election of Westminster scholars to Christchurch, Oxford, and to Trinity College, Cambridge, took place on Tuesday in presence of the electors. The following is the result of the election:—Christchurch: Viscount Ebrington, G.B., M.P., of Oxford, and A. H. Wilbraham, of Sandringham, Christchurch, Oxford. Trinity College, Cambridge: J. S. Rymer, B. Symons, W. Bowden, G. T. M. O'Brien, G. C. H. Chapman. Dean Thomas's Exhibitioner, F. J. Sandnell. Dr. Busby's Exhibitioner, Hon. C. of Westminster, elected at dinner in the College Hall the electors and the annually large and distinguished assembly of old Westminsters.

THE DISTRESS IN THE NORTH.

On Monday the usual weekly meeting of the General Executive Relief Committee was held in the Manchester Townhall; Sir J. P. Kay Shuttleworth presiding. The following is the total amount of relief given in the past week:—Flour, forty-four tonnes of beef, and eight packages of clothing had been distributed, and the local committees for distribution reported that the total amount received was £2700, and the balance in the bankers' hands was £3500 less. The Commissioner Francis's report stated that in the week ending 2nd inst. there was a decrease in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, in twenty-seven unions in the cotton-manufacturing districts, as compared with the number in the week of the previous week, of 3071. The question of finding employment for the cotton operatives was discussed, and a resolution to the following effect was carried:—"That it is the opinion of this committee that the desirable public improvements could be carried on for the relief of the distress without incurring a renewal of relief, if means to obtain loans for long terms, at low rates of interest, were permitted to local authorities, and that a memorial to that effect be presented to the Government."

The Marsden Home Committee held their weekly meeting last week. The total sum received for the fund was reported to be £2,000, of which £500 had been remitted to the affected districts, exclusive of a sum of £1 4s 6d for carriage. The amount expended was £1,500, or £1,000 in cash, of which £500 was from colonial resources. The total amount granted by the committee to the various unions was £1,500, of which £1,000 was contributed from different emigration committees. One from the Queensland Immigration Committee, presided over by Mr. Gordon, has sent out 200 persons, and programmes from Launceston to Queensland, having been assisted by a grant of money from the central fund. It was proposed to provide for the wants of the committees would give him a supplemental grant of £4 a head. The committee, however, declined to make the grant; but resolved to recommend that if any committee had the funds to send out a given number of emigrants, they should receive a grant of £2 per head to assist in defraying the cost of the outfit.

Mr. Rawlinson, in company with Mr. Farnall, is making the tour of the principal cotton-manufacturing districts, to ascertain what public works can be undertaken with advantage, and the readiness of the local authorities to co-operate. It is understood that they have met with so much encouragement as to promise success to the Government scheme. Individual committees have been appointed in some towns to ascertain what works of improvements are needed and can be profitably entered upon; which, it is understood, Government will advance the money required at a moderate rate of interest under the Local Government Act, so that the adult operatives may find employment for some time to come at full wages. Mr. Rawlinson has expressly declared that the responsibility of carrying out these undertakings will rest entirely upon the corporations, which will have eventually to pay the money, and therefore they are to be no Government interference, control, or official agency. The scheme is in no respect one of relief. The same time, employment at the cotton-mills is increasing, and emigration is somewhat thinning the ranks of the unemployed, so that the prospects of Lancashire are slowly brightening.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Many coming home from foreign parts have frequently, among other passengers, persons described as "distressed British seamen;" but Parliament is just now besieged by a number of "outraged British subjects" claiming redress for their scandalous treatment by foreign Governments. After Don Pacifico and his broken cups and saucers the British public has become alive to injuries sustained by gentlemen whose British nationality was, to say the least, problematical; and this unwillingness to listen to complaints has often been the means of a grave failure in justice. The poor Baron De Bode has not got his claims settled yet, though Committees after Committees of the House have decided in his favour. Two cases, however, have recently occured in which we trust ample compensation to the sufferer will be exacted by the British Government. The case of Captain Melville White, who was arrested in Lima, in Peru, on a perfectly false charge, flung into a loathsome dungeon in the old prison of the Inquisition, half starved, insulted, and finally sent on the Peruvian territory, has just been brought before the Legislature. And we are glad to learn that more than one Member has already taken in the analogous case of Captain Henry de Wolfe Carvell, a fiscal fine imposed by the Custom-house officers at Jones's Bay, the commission in triplicate, who, for no greater offence than coming out from England to visit his friends, was condemned to the efforts of his father-in-law, Mr. Winder, a wealthy merchant of Lima, to which will be had been appointed executor, was subjected to the grossest and most wanton ill-treatment on the part of the Peruvian Government and its corrupt officials, browbeaten, defrauded, and denied all kind of justice. Mr. De Carvell secured actual legal evidence of the horrible prisons of Peru by taking refuge, first under the British flag and then under the French, at the houses of the respective countries; but he appears none the less to have been most scandalously treated, and deprived of a vast amount of property due to him. The Peruvian officials were indeed careful to see that before they hated the "Gringo"—i e., the English—and that they were determined not to do him justice in the property question at issue.

One of the principal attractions at the Fine-Art Exhibition, now open at the Palais de l'Industrie, in Paris, is a huge panorama about to the new Opera House to be erected on the Boulevard des Capucines. The ponderously, considered with fragility, of the material, employed in the model has retarded the ingenious device of a panorama for many of its conveyance from the atelier of the architect to the Champs Elysées. The actual edifice is in course of erection, and when it is finished, it accounts, the new Académie Impériale de Musique will be the most magnificent and commodious theatre in the world. In this country we have two Houses of Parliament, both very sumptuous and both too large for the purpose for which they are designed. With Parliament dissolved Majesty's Theatre is now in question of "one go up and another come down." If the first be overpowered by the latter, a conjuror's spectacle, and not a ballet, will be Nevertheless, we need new theatres. Drury Lane is supposed to be the home of the legitimate drama, but it is too closely environed by theatrical rivals to command a continuous audience. We envy that On the other hand, there are very many crowded districts of London, which have no new, respectable, and well-built theatre conducted and playing sterling pieces in lieu of vicious trash, would be of inestimable advantage to the masses of the people, promoting order, temperance, and morality—a cause which we cannot recognise to be in any way promoted by garish and frivolous comic-singing and acrobat tumbling at the so-called "free and easies."

Mr. Hoxicault made a move in the right direction when he redemocratised the Lyceum, but he has not gone far enough. Let more, we trust, when the New Theatre Company gets into working order, it will open with a respectable stock company. But of the cheap, well conducted theatre, par simple, there is an absolute dearth. Let us suppose a company of Horton—a handsome, roomy, well-ventilated salle, holding from three to four thousand persons. The prices of admittance are very low; the audience are not exhibitanted by champagne, but by refreshments of a simple and unpolluted congregation of spectators we have never seen. We journeyed to the Britannia, and were charged a penny-piece. We "assisted at Pepper's Ghost," specially imported from the genteel regions of the Polytechnic to the Hoxton Hall. We are free to confess that the melodrama in which the "Ghost" was introduced was not above the standard of "The Colleen Bawn" or "The Duke's Motto," but it was fairly acted and carefully mounted, and was not a bit worse than "The Ferfect Cure" or "The Strand, the Strand." Indeed, we decidedly enjoyed it. We had a capital view, sandwiched from a gentleman in corduroy, and in the stalls, "Wee 'as its vay for avlies" was as likely as its hinning to be heard by him who hover the 'ed." The most gratifying circumstance in connection with the Britannia is that all entertainments required by the audience can be procured within the walls of the building. Ladies and gentlemen can order in their own cabs between the acts, and go straight home after the performance without encountering any "cads" at the door. Remember that, as a rule, they come from these harmless places of amusement in their own carriages.

Hendi in hand with cheap theatres—where rubbish need not, as a matter of course, be played; for good authors, were they adequately remunerated, would write for them—should be established free reading-houses—cones that admirable and beneficial movement for establishing Institutes in connection with the working classes. The Working Men's Institute Union had a conversazione at the Hanover-square Rooms on Tuesday evening last, when the Earl of Shaftesbury, who has for many years been the active and most efficient friend of the working classes, and who, by his social position and his wealth, has it in his power to do much for their welfare, presided. Lord Lyttelton, Lord Ebrington, and Mr. Akroyd; Sir Frank Crossley, M.P., and many other influential gentlemen were likewise present.

There is a capital old English proverb to the effect that it is best to let well alone, and we fear that the "Working Men's Institute Union" is not a well alone, and we fear that it would be indeed a pity if it were not. The Union has done much good, but many things were rigidly observed, the word "Institute" might be changed into "Club," "Hall," "Tavern," "Theatre," or, at least, "Gathering" or "Reunion" substituted for it. The idea of a working man's club or working people on precisely the same basis as that which is found between the cup and the lip of the aristocracy is simply preposterous, and, if persisted in, will only end in deplorable failure. A Club must be a Club, and cannot be anything else without losing the essence of the ethnic. Everything that can make life pleasant is to be found between the cup and the lip of a French cook, a good cellar, a recondite library, the choicest brands of cigars, the newest and best of play cards, to take or to lay the odds on the Derby or the Oaks, and, in short, the enjoyment of all the physical intrigues, to regale himself on rich meats and wines, and, if need be, to fall asleep in an arm-chair in the smoking-room. The system of voting by ballot gives him the power of excluding from his society those whose manners and conversation may be displeasing to him. We presume that the council of the Union do not wish to see a large building erected for the half-mad pattern become an organised institution among the industrial classes, but that they desire, on the other hand, envious for the formation of places—half mechanics' institutes and half clubs—in which the intelligent mechanic and the humbler cadre can resort to improve their minds, to indulge in the social amusements of conversation, draughts, and chess, and occasionally with non-intoxicating beverages. Nor, we take it, should there be any lack of the fine clubs; and then, without a ballot-box, what becomes of a club?

Among the new works promised for speedy publication by Messrs. Chapman and Hall, we are glad to call attention to a novel by Mrs. Bernal Osborne, with the "taking" title of "Pales Pontines," and, mirabile dictu, a grave romance by Gwen Meredith (Mr. Robert Bulwer Lytton), called "The Ring of Amasis." An entirely new edition of Dyce's Shakspeare is also forthcoming; and this will not be a mere reprint of the edition of 1857, but will contain numerous and important additions and corrections of the text, and a copious glossary, bearing on obscure words or little known customs alluded to in the works of the poet.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Common Sense of the Water Cure. By Capt. I. H. Lukis, (Robert Hardwicke.) Captain Lukis does not "see" into the sanity of hoisting sense upon stilts," and he has therefore chosen a sprightly, gossiping, and, severe critics would say, flippant style for instilling into the public mind his views about hydrotherapeutics. He thinks in very readable, although it is noticeable for a tendency to iteration of occasional stale sayings and stock phrases, and he discourses of a matter which concerns us all—for who amongst us is disease-proof? If Mr. Lukis's book should make us "fever-proof and likewise ague," we doubt whether even he had obtained complete mastery over his digressive organs; and he is chiefly to commission with dyspepsia that Capt. Lukis considers the subject of hydropathy. He gives a circumstantial account of his conversion from drug-worship, of the course of treatment adopted at a hydropathic or hydropathetic establishment, and of the conditions necessary to ensure a successful issue. After all, it seems the most important point of course is that which Wisdom has been from time immemorial crying aloud at the corners of the streets—namely, temperance, cleanliness, regularity, and moderation in all things. But at this advice there are hundreds of thousands who are constrained to make sarcastic reply. They must live in an impure atmosphere: they must go without exercise: they must exceed moderation—at any rate, in work; and for them a mockery: they must take the drugs which give temporary relief, even if they hasten the final inevitable end. Though a rather enthusiastic convert, Captain Lukis does not pronounce hydropathy infallible: he only says that the failure in hydropathy failure he could cite twenty allopathic failures. When we consider that allopathic patients bear to hydropathic a ratio of probably more than fifty to one, we shall not be surprised at all assertion; nor, when we reflect that his complaint appears to have been only the result of every life in India, shall we be disposed to set him down as a good example of the probable effects of the system upon one who drinks no ordinary, but, on the contrary, excellence, and, moreover, fulfils unaccountable diseases: fait experiencium in corpore vili, let us have the experience of some feeble wretch who has never tried his constitution. Perhaps the story told by Captain Lukis may be that the Russian physician is more to the point.

Writing for the Verdict. An Autobiography. Edited by P. Aitkin. (Saunders and Otley.) This work displays no ordinary power. We discern in it germs of much literary facility locked for in a good novelist except taste and order. Rhapsody, sentimentality, and hyperbole are harsh terms to use; but we hope the author will pardon us if we venture to hint—not in a spirit of unkind assumption, but with real deference—that they are applicable to his book. He may, perhaps, laugh in his sleeve, muttering that the critic has been thus supposed to be written in a state of temporary insanity; but we should most earnestly caution him against even the question of taste involved in it by asking how it is that we detect no change of style when the hypothetical autobiographer recovers (according to his own account) his reason? The main point is that the story be duly told, and finally:—Ernest Clarkson loves Lady Helen (not known to be a lady of title until just before her death), elopes with her, her parents die, and fancies he has killed Helen's seducer, or, as he expresses it, "a man—" and has "fled from the scene." Upon him; it turns out to be a mere hallucination, and therefore the hero's life is meaningless, and we are to give our verdict from a moral point of view, in which case we certainly pronounce for the prosecution. Mr. Aitkin has evidently the astounding assertion at the fourth page—"I, Ernest Clarkson, write my own memoirs under a feigned name," and he thinks that I am dipping this own pen of mine in my heart's blood while I do write." We are happy to be able to assure him that the fluid used in the printing is of the usual colour, and that the outward and visible mark of a cowardly and horror are confined to the customary dashes, explosives, and notes of consternation.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

If the whippers-in, who are obliged, and the Prime Minister, who chooses, to remain in or about the House of Commons from its meeting to its rising are consulted, they would doubtless give it as sitting to its rising and not to midnight as we meant an easy one. their opinion that the present Session is by no means an easy one. Private Legislation does not flower abundantly; the last talk is profuse, and, what is more, the talk is, in many cases, good. In this column we have more than once spoken depreciatingly of the existing Parliament, and we are only delighted now to confess that recent events have shown that it is not wholly barren. Our censure has been often asked, where are our rising statesmen; or, rather, where are our budding members of Parliament? Young statesmen were once to come the men who were to fill the places, which must, in due time, become vacant, of our veteran orators and politicians; and it appeared to be no preparation for occupying the seats of the Palmerstons, the Derbys, the Gladstones, and the Disraelis. Well, it would seem that a movement has sprung up amongst the rising legislators. As an illustration, Mr. Stansfeld has commenced his official training, and a Home Secretary who has already the necessities of seven years hence; and one or two young members have been showing blood, and have exercisedly welcomed by the old hands. But to descend to particulars.

Assuredly Mr. Pope Hennessy (of whom, by-the-by, it may be said that he was the first of the juvenile members who had the courage to attempt a position in the House, and who first broke into the charmed circle of cave and reverend, and therefore tame and unimpressible, silence) has not been rapped that such a debate on Italian affairs would have been initiated by an apparently simple motion of his one evening, or he would not have confined himself to a very brief and modest speech. Did he know how the running was to be made by colts, and did he think that he had no harmonies amongst them because he might be considered aged? However that may be, certain it is that Mr. Cavendish-Bentinck was in the right spot, and, indeed, he spoke an adopted one with a coolness, a cobra style, and twitter of the shanpokes, and was too directly menacing towards, and shook his finger rather too frequently at, Lord Palmerston, for a member who has yet to win a capital speech from his point of view. Its effect may be appreciated by the fact that Mr. Layard, who followed him, and who spoke a portion of discretion with which he is endowed, and scolded—nay, roared at times, and always looked as if he could be quite capable of brutal conduct—failed to shudder, and the Premier doubtless to make a mental note of a subordinate who could be provoked to make such a damaging exhibition of himself and to outrage parliamentary and diplomatic habitude. About two Sessions ago, at a late hour, there suddenly rose, and, on a question in the Estimates, made a speech, which was received with a noble Lord—by courtesy—who had hitherto been supposed to be one of the first representatives of the popular English mind. It was an erratic second soon, and who was known for not much more than being a kind of fetcher and carrier for Mr. Disraeli, having been once his private secretary. On that occasion, the speaker was quite capable of better things; and since then he has from time to time, and with some judgment, cultivated his advantage, and has become the Benjamin of the House. On this occasion, of course advisedly, allusions were made to him in the debate, and he was in a position which might be said to have forced, him into addressing the House; and, casting aside for the moment the airy and half-supercilious manner which he has hitherto adopted, he went in for a well-composed and well-arranged speech, which was business-like and exhaustive without being dull. In the least like, on the whole, Mr. Henry Lennox asserted and assumed the position in the House towards which he has been for some time tending, and he was evidently a gratulatory feeling about the House which signified gladness that the young members were coming out, for here was a second success.

But the surprise and the pleasure had not yet culminated. Early in the evening there slipped quietly into the House, by the back Opposition and a very youthful member, whose face and figure were indistinct, it might be, some considerable time. All that can we would suppose to be much above the twenty-one years which entitle any one to sit in the House, although, in the absence of catching the Speaker's eye, his presenting himself in due time became a matter of course. He rose in the midst of a debate, and a very youth—that is, a gentleman who looks young but is not—on the Ministerial side, who palpably looked young, and whom the boys opposite were not to have it all their own way. The cry of course was for the new member, and every one settled down to endure one of those inspiring, statesmanlike, and thoroughly well prepared sentence—half of which being forgotten cause those that are left not to fit together—which are called maiden speeches. We five minutes something of this kind came, and people were thinking of anything else, when they heard, clearing the throat, and the usual observations, which were found to proceed from the very young gentleman who had been nearly forgotten, and whose name every one presently began eagerly to ask. For Mr. Hibbert very soon had the House enchained by a masterly argument, illustrated by taste, denoting singular acuteness of perception, and by a tone of mind and spirit which were creditable at once to his good sense and his good feeling. In a short time there rang out from the Ministerial benches the usual cheers that attention was attracted thither, and those were Mr. Gladstone devouring the young speaker with eager eyes, and every moment pouring a series of high-pitched and enthusiastic "I hears" which seemed to come from the very bottom of his heart. And no wonder; for before him was a display of talent, the like of which the orator of whom he might have been glad to say, "I taught the boy." In truth, the defect and the drawback of the first and maiden speech was that it was too much that of a practised casuist, and dangerously unlike that of a very young lawyer and a neophyte in a subject. It was, however, the great success in Parliament of modern time—that is in the last quarter of a century. Something has been whispered of the paper which was the occasion of a recent argue of whom he might have been glad to say, "I taught the boy." In truth, the defect and the drawback of the first and maiden speech was that it was too much that of a practised casuist, and dangerously unlike that of a very young lawyer and a neophyte in a subject. It was, however, the great success in Parliament of modern time—that is in the last quarter of a century. Something has been whispered of the paper which was the occasion of a recent coincidence.

Stimulated, perhaps, by this event, and having opportunity given him for retort on his special opponent, Mr. Gladstone delivered one of his very best speeches in this debate. He had gone away, and, from his dress apparently, dined out; but he had prepared a special desire to speak, leaving the winding-up of the debate to Lord Palmerston. But Mr. Disraeli, having prepared for the contingencies of the same debate, twisting and twirling it into an unstriking mark of appropriate and inappropriate allusion, and of a sense of humour, which, remembering probably the eagerness with which Mr. Disraeli pounced upon him on a former evening at the moment of a humiliation which he had to undergo, could not resist such a temptation before him. So he rose, but quietly, even languidly: and, in a subdued voice, his words dropping, as it were, like lead, he, as he had been often alluded to in the debate, he would (glancing at the clock—it was half-past two) not trespass upon the House—he would be uttered a few sentences. And then he proceeded for half an hour in a style not usual with him—for it was light and bantering in appearance, but really intensely caustic and bitter. Mr. Disraeli, to illustrate the subject in debate with wondrous power and effect. On the Italian question Mr. Gladstone speaks with a sort of apologetic and unfettered by any little eccentricities of genius, and therefore he is what may be truly called magnificent in the word, his debate, on which we have thus dwelt, was the best that has come before the House for years.

For the rest, it may be said that the characteristics of the House have been well developed. Take the discussion on Mr. Christie's charges in brief, when Mr. Bramley-Moore made an apologetic and personalities were so rife, and when a complaint on that score naturally elicited from Lord Robert Cecil a protest against any limitation of the right of abuse and showing up people. With a certain appropriateness, that noble Lord always sits next to Mr. Roebuck, and, when he rises, seems to emerge from the peculiar atmosphere which always surrounds the honourable member for Sheffield. Indeed, Mr. Roebuck himself this week appears to fear that he will be outdone by his unconscious pupil, for one night he intimated his claim to be the most accomplished and scientific master of that language which was once popularly ascribed as peculiar to ladies who were denizens of a metropolitan fishmarket. Wait he called Sir Henry Stokes, and how he rated the Duke of Newcastle, it book not to say; but we desire to record the fact that it had the effect of putting up the generally cold blood of Mr. Chichester Fortescue, and caused that decorously-dull gentleman and model Under-Secretary to utter some exquisitely-keen sarcasms, and to avenge the House for something nearly akin to insult towards them implied in the language and manner of Mr. Roebuck. Mentioning, in a desultory way, points which, as he said, he might be told this, on Monday, for some reason or other, the House was for some time nearly deserted. At one period there was literally no one on the Treasury bench, and Mr. Speaker Denison benches, and only seventeen on the other side. It was curious to see Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Layard—who were looking one of their frequent discussions on details of the Budget—spoke and acted, in the midst of the emptiness, with a sort of extraordinary and vehemence as if they had been in presence of an audience of a thousand persons. Speaking of an empty house reminds us that there has been an English debate in the House of Lords. Imagine Sir Charles Wood rising to introduce the House on an Indian question by a quarter to twelve, and going on, to his own manifest satisfaction, until past one.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Royal assent was given to a number of bills by commission.

The Hares (Ireland) Bill and the Fisheries (Ireland) Bill were read a third time and passed.

The Petitions during the Recess Bill, the Telegraphs Bill, and the Marriages (Ireland) Bill were read a second time.

The Earl of Derby said that he thought once more pleaded the cause of Mr. Bishop, the young Englishman who is undergoing a term of imprisonment in the Papal States for carrying treasonable despatches from Naples and Turin. The noble Marquis censured the conduct of the Italian Governments. He (the noble Earl) could not agree with the noble Marquis in the severe censure he threw from the elevated position he occupied, and, relying on his Majesty's Government not to delay using representations.—The Duke of SUTHERLAND.

Lord Lyveden said that Mr. Bishop was a British subject, and had been arrested without trial, and that, Bishop, in particular, could have nothing to complain of beyond the detention of his despatches, which he had a right to carry. It was his opinion that Mr. Bishop had been treated with undue harshness; but Lord Cowley, as foreign Secretary, had done his duty in bringing the case of Bishop in this country committing an offence similar to that for which Mr. Bishop is now suffering. Mr. Bishop was not guilty of any crime to urge his release.—Lord CARNARVON, who was Colonial Under Secretary in Lord Derby's Government, could not look upon Mr. Bishop in the same light as other British subjects. The first gentleman was himself to blame for any misfortune which had overtaken him. He had entered into a conspiracy, he confessed it, and he was, on Mr. Bishop's health, and the friendship England had shown to Italy, the Government of Victor Emmanuel had not been unmindful of the interests of Mr. Bishop. Lord RUSSELL expressed his sympathy with the family of Mr. Bishop; but could not understand why Mr. Bishop had gone to Italy. He thought, in carrying that, himself with the affairs of Italy, and took such part as a subject of this country ought not to take. He had placed himself in the position in which he was placed. Her Majesty's Government, however, had done everything in their power to urge his immediate release.—Lord CAMPBELL

THE FARM.

HOWEVER hard it may seem to pass over "the home of the Durhams," it is difficult to show cause against the decision which the Royal Agricultural Society have arrived at of holding their show for the second time at Newcastle-on-Tyne, after a lapse of only sixteen years. Fifty-one members and the chairman were officially reported as present; but when the vote took place on the main question of Newcastle-Tyne v. Durham county, the numbers were twenty-one to eighteen. The visiting deputation seem to have been sorely divided, two voted for Durham county, one for Newcastle, and another remained neutral. Durham and Darlington went into detailed accounts, both in print and vivâ voce, of their respective local merits with an ardour and unanimous worthy of a winning cause, and the Attorney-General led in person for the former. The statement of the enthusiastic town was mainly directed to a highly reasonable comparison of itself with Darlington, and it claimed a majority of 195 in licensed victuallers alone, to say nothing of nearly a whole population of unlicensed inhabitants, and hundreds more. Darlington was quite prepared for that argument, and offered to guarantee nearly 1000 beds in the town, and houses and stables in the Tuesday visions of the steam-ploughs gallantly smashing up the "old sward" of the racecourse had carried the day for Durham. Some of the farmers were left to bite their glove at each other till the society again comes their way. The approach of the battle of Worcester is eternity to people's membership, and sixty-six new ones were elected. The general meeting will be held on Friday next, when twenty-five members are council or out by rotation. Eleven candidates at once and two committees are now given in full, and it appears that two of them have never been out from "the ring of the Lead" committee since "the year the present time." The society hold their meeting in "the Far West" in 1867, and Bath will no doubt fight hard to have the show which Bristol and Exeter have already attained.

Apropos of the Holker beck, we may note that the Eighth Duke of Oxford has been slaughtered, the Tenth left to Mr. Willoughby Wood, the Eleventh sold to Mr. Hall, of Kirkham, and that Kidlonan, by the Ninth Duke of Oxford from Dustie, has been sold to Mr. Thomas Lawson, Kent, a spirited Cumberland breeder. "Double First," by Eleventh Duke of Oxford from Cleopatra 9th, is 16/1 second favourite for the Lead Coronets, which are very strong and full of hair, have come so far in the shape of "New York" from Cleopatra 3rd, Cleopatra 9th from 1866, and 26th, Thirteenth, Duke of Oxford, Fourteenth Duchess of Oxford, and "Charleston" from Countess of Harrington. Mr. Richard Stone has announced Mr. J. T. Hutchinson's Bull Sale for sale on the 2nd of June, at Brockley Farm, near Lewisham. There are thirty-four lots of cows and heifers, and one bull, Duke of Cherry Dales 3rd (15,763), which has been chiefly used. Mr. Noakes has been a pretty extensive but quiet buyer of bulls of late at Mr. Duddeg and others, and it is from the former that he derives his strong dash of the Knightley blood. The veteran, Mr. Wiley, who is now the ruler of Barnsbrook and Mr. Patten Bacon, who is also a young buyer and sow of his celebrated small white Yorkshire breed to the Blanzac of Woodside, for his Scarne Knightley bull, and the Sleswig Holstein Augustenburg.

Parliament has been hurrying itself more than usual with agricultural matters. Sir Pitrroy Kelly will, it is said, move for a special committee to consider the operation of the malt-tax. Mr. Rolland has put down a motion for the 19th to bring the Cattle Disease Prevention bill; and Mr. Paull has withdrawn his Poisoned Grain Prohibition Bill, and says he will have to introduce another "to prohibit the sale or use of poisoned grain or seed; or poisonous preparations, in certain cases, and for the destruction of birds and animals not protected by law." The agricultural members were not very cordial, and, in fact, seemed to smell a rat; and "Sam Slick" rose specially to inquire what was to be the fate of political rats if it came into operation.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Chester meeting, feeble and unsatisfactory as it was, had three points of interest in the Cup victory of the top weight, Asteroid, the first win of Tommy Sanderson, at the Northumberland's own town of "The Doctor, late Istrus," by the Cure, for whom, as he is half-brother to Lecturer, it was mainly hoped at Goodwood that Lord Stamford would give a thousand. The decision of the Grand Stand committee to withhold their grant unless Mr. Topham resigned was not altogether unlooked for, and it is said that Mr. Carvill or Mr. Johnson, of York, will take office. Bath had a spirited meeting, and some remarkably close races. Its popular steward, Mr. Hugh Beaufort, won a good stake with Orythea; while the noble Premier pulled off the Bath Handicap with Spencer, and had a hollow race to only a head. On the Wednesday Canary gave John Day (whose son John rode his maiden race at Salisbury) another good turn, and Molly Carew rescued Sir Bartar at last in Lady Ly Turner's interest, which received 5lb.

The Sweaton platform, which has heard the crack of doom over many a Derby favourite, selected National Guard as its '63 victim of "the up journey," but Lord Clifden went steadily through the ordeal, and was quoted as healthy at 9 to 2 when the train reached Paddington. The noblebs did their best for him on Saturday and Monday last, but these pleasing prices did not induce any on his behalf were happily frustrated, and the greatest fear which has troubled his friends is that Lord Clifden may be stricken by fear in his way. If there had been a screw loose in his preparation he could not have won so steadily as he has done; and many of his backers to say that the idea of an outsider as a chronic delusion, and that Hotchkiss and Mr. Mecaulay are spoken of as the heroes of Saccharometer, The Ghillie, The Rangey, Tom Fool, National Guard, King of the Vale, Hespodar, Fantastic, Avondale, Donnybrook, Early Fun, Golden Style, Scamander, Balfolly, Lady Elizabeth, Ben Nevis, Safeguard, Fibfluster, Giles the First, Avenger, King of Utopia, Stockowner, Lady Coventry, Hindite, Dudley, Bonnie Dundee, Tumbour Major, Cairnsetate, Rapid Rhone, Melrose, Brother to Morocco, and Blackman are spoken of as the heroes of others from which the field will probably be selected. The running of Lady Augusta in the One Thousand has gone far to quench all speculation for the Oaks, in which Old Orange Girl, Hippodamia, Lucia, Queen Iberia, Borealis, The Orphan, Miss Armstrong, &c., are among the probables for the Derby. Mr. Milward's sale of yearlings at Rugby week at Tattersall's, and this year ten will come up, ranging from 12l to 1l 1s. Of these, on Saturday, Hippodamia, 300 gs. for Lord Newnan's yearlings will be sold at the Stockwell paddock.

Eleven "Surrey suits" were tried this week at Oval, and, not counting their captain, Tom Lockyer's, innings, they scored 181, of which Bush made 66 and Nightingale 53, in a style which augurs well for his skill in matches to come.

The late Sir Richard Sutton's sale of hunters was considered a wonder, but all only nine and a half guineas-per-head on the top upwards, and the highest price was 360 gs. for Somerby and Shanhton. Mr. Anderson's 500 gs. for Cassio at Sir Richard's sale, and "no other "great fact" of that sale—viz., three horses averaging 450 gs.—was quite eclipsed at Quorn last week, as ten horses averaged 453 gs., and four others 400 gs. The eighty lots, including two ponies, realised 14,322 gs., and Pilot (Mr. Chaplin), 520 gs., headed the poll. The Friars of the Rose gave 500 gs. for Bentinck, and 310 gs. for Tom the Man. It was a worthy finale to a very brilliant seven years' mastership, for which Leicestershire has never shown itself particularly grateful.

The forthcoming Islington Dog Show has received 1647 entries, of which at least 1000 constitute the regular exhibition. The hounds will be judged in public on the private-view day (May 25); and among the other most novel features of the show will be a section devoted to nursing-mothers and their puppies of prize lives, and from bloodshed to the dog-fancier. "Several readers have written to me just awakened to the consciousness that the show is to take place, and are most pathetic on what they endured from the howling of last summer.

It is said that "Deerfoot" has at last quitted our shores, carrying with him upwards of a thousand pounds as the fruits of his running labours. His final race on Monday at Hackney-wick proved what the knowing ones have always said, that for travelling an hour against time at his own pace he had no equal, but that he could not run in darkness. Under this belief, Lamb and White made the pace a cracker that although Deerfoot ran his first three miles under 15 min. they actually outlapped him, and he soon afterwards gave up. The pair did the three miles in 14 min. 35 sec., and before the end of seven miles, which only occupied 31 min. 35 sec., Lang was obliged to stop, and virtually leave to Northumberland the honour of having the champion sculler and the champion runner as well.

In the American papers there are numerous advertisements of persons wishing to adopt children made orphans by the war. One advertisement mentioned that the applicant was a Jew, and objected on that account to a girl of the name of Christian. Another, blue pen, Lincoln's death. Little George is ready.

The Figaro of Madrid of the 9th inst. states that Spain and Portugal will soon be completely united by railway. On the last inauguration of the Portuguese line between Badajoz and Elvas—a distance of nearly forty miles—took place amidst the enthusiasm of the inhabitants. The Duke de Loulé, President of the Council of Ministers (Visconde Sa da Bandeira), and M. José Bressmacap, and other distinguished personages, went by special train from Lisbon to the Portuguese frontier, and were received at a magnificent collation, at which toasts were drunk to the Royal family, to the success of the Portuguese Railway Company, and to the prosperity of the two countries. The Portuguese company has now 125 miles of this line in course of working.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE pretty general impression having been that capital for commercial purposes must become dearer, increased sales of money have been effected, and prices have, in consequence, become sensitive, and prices have generally declined. The Unlimited Debtors has been in a most depressed state, and some of the bills have been sent back.

The Bank Rate of Discount remains unaltered at 3 per cent. In the city of England and in Lombard street; and on the Continent capital is in fair request. The Bank Return for the week ending Saturday last exhibits a decrease of £1,000 in the bullion held by the Bank of England. The Bank of France has also had some decrease in its bullion, which has occasioned much restricted. Rate shares have sold at 80½ ⅜ Ditto, Seven per Cent Preference, 4½ | Illinois Central Shares, 80½ 80½ ex div.

There has been less firmness in the market for Foreign Bonds, and the Mexican Loans have been somewhat depressed. Spanish Bonds have also been fully reported the late improvement in their value.

The business done in Railway Shares has been moderately numerous, and on the whole prices have been well supported.

The Joint-Stock Financial Society's recently launched upon our market, has proved a great success. The shares have been done as high as 10 and 12 premium.

On Thursday the Home market was firm:—Consols closed at 92¾ to ⅞ for Money, and 92⅞ to ⅞ for the Account. Bank Stock, 345 to 347. Reduced, 92⅞ to ⅞. Ditto 3 per Cents sold at 91½ to ⅝ and Exchequer Bills, 4s. dis. to par.

The business done in Foreign Securities has been much restricted. Erie Shares have sold at 40½ ⅜ Ditto, Seven per Cent Preference, 4½ | Illinois Central Shares, 80½ 80½ ex div.

might have hardly deigned to look. Here, for instance, we must needs interest ourselves for a little while in this group of children caught in the storm, some distance, perhaps, from the home at which they may be anxiously expected. First we notice the elder girl, with her dress drawn up, with heedful foresight, over her head, and screening her little sister under the canopy thus formed—an embryo type of the generous love of womanhood and maternity. Next we are charmed with the slight touch of fear in the little one cowering for protection. Then we note, as characteristic of a little man, the independent feeling of the boy sitting a little apart, with folded arms, and silently speculating, like a philosopher, upon the phenomena he watches so intently. In this way the reader may proceed till he works out his own idyl from these simple materials, till, as we have done, even the covered cart, vanishing through the mist and rain, becomes a thing of human interest, and we feel provoked we cannot see the driver and demand whether he has been so churlish as not to offer these little ones "a lift," if perchance he is going in the direction of their home. In this way he might amuse himself in fancy over so long; but it would be still longer before he began to think anything about the actual painting and technicalities of this picture. In all which behold that concealment of art which, according to an adage too well known for repetition, proves its perfection.

PLATE PRESENTED BY FIELD-MARSHAL GOUGH TO THE 87TH ROYAL IRISH FUSILIERS.

We have much pleasure in giving to our readers an Engraving of a piece of plate lately presented by Field Marshal Viscount Gough to his old regiment, the 87th Royal Irish Fusiliers. The pedestal is triangular. On one side is a spirited representation of the capture of the Eagle of the 8th French Light Infantry by the 87th Regiment, under Major Gough, at the battle of Barrosa, fought on the 5th of March, 1811. On another are the different badges and distinctions of the regiment. The third side bears the following inscription, worthy of the donor and most gratifying to the regiment:—"Presented to the officers of the 87th Royal Irish Fusiliers by Field Marshal Viscount Gough, K.P., G.C.B., K.S.I., in remembrance of companionship in arms and gratifying association in time of peace." Lord Gough, then Major Gough, commanded through the whole of its arduous service in the Peninsular War this fine and always thoroughly national regiment, at that time designated "The Prince of Wales's own Irish Regiment." For its many distinguished services during this war the 87th was made a fusilier regiment. This plate is by Messrs. R. and S. Garrard and Co.

THE DALRYMPLE MEMORIAL CHAPEL, UNION MILLS, ISLE OF MAN.

THIS chapel, which was opened on the 29th ult., was erected as a memorial of the life and labours of a singularly good and useful man. A native of Scotland, possessing the strong religious feeling which marks the people of that country, and of cultivated intellect, James Dalrymple, among many other useful works, brought his zeal and knowledge to bear upon giving religious instruction in the thinly-peopled district in which he found himself located. And, not satisfied with ministering to the spiritual need of those around him, Mr. Dalrymple self-educated himself so as to be the doctor of the poor within his reach. Being a man singularly practical in his nature, of large grasp of mind, and quick in the appreciation of truth, he soon picked up enough of knowledge to make himself useful in a district where doctors were distant and patients poor. He had one invariable rule of action—to charge nothing for his services to any individual, however wealthy, while to the poor he gave both advice and medicines gratuitously. Being a man of great vigour and endurance, he often walked many miles to visit a patient who was too ill to wait on him, so that in the course of time he became known in almost every nook of the island; and wherever he went he was sure to be met with the friendly recognition or blessing of some of the many hundreds whom he had benefited. He lived to the ripe age of eighty-four.

The foundation-stone of the memorial chapel was laid on the 25th of June, 1862, by Captain John Hamilton, of Villa Marina, Greenock, an old and intimate friend of the deceased. The building is 30 ft. long by 19 ft. broad, is calculated to hold about 130 persons, and is a great ornament to the village. The architect is Mr. John Robinson, of Douglas, and the contractor is Mr. Henry Robinson, of the same place.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. KERR.

THE workpeople of the Royal Porcelain Works at Worcester have recently presented a testimonial to W. H. Kerr, Esq., on his retirement, as a token of the esteem in which they hold his conduct as an employer and as a gentleman. The vase is china, having a fine mazarine or cobalt-blue ground (for which colour Worcester has always been celebrated), and upon which the subjects are painted in the style of the Limoges enamels. The principal subject is designed from Homer's hymn, called "The Furnace," and represents Homer singing to the potters of Samos, who, in return, present him with some of their vases. It is also valuable in the history of the art, as showing the high esteem in which it was held. At that time the productions of the potter were not unfrequently given as prizes to the successful competitors in the various public games, then esteemed manly and honourable. The reverse side has an enamel ornamental scroll with a figure centre; on the neck of the vase are suspended, on each side, portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Kerr, also painted in enamel, which are remarkable for their fidelity of expression. The gold borders are in the Greek style, relieved by chasing, and producing a charming effect by contrast with the silver-work. It is elegantly mounted, having on each side a silver handle, the top of which represents a griffin's head, and the lower part the claws. Beneath the illustration of Homer is a fringe of silver, besides which there are borders and beadwork of silver running round the vase, all being in character with the other parts. The mounting was intrusted to Messrs. Manning and Manning, silversmiths, Worcester, who, at considerable risk, have been successful in adding much to the graceful and characteristic appearance of the vase. It stands on an ebony pedestal, on which is a silver plate, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to W. H. Kerr, Esq., by the workpeople of the Royal Porcelain Works, Worcester, as a token of their affectionate remembrance and regard."

NEW NATIONAL SCHOOLS, LOUGHTON.

WE give a representation of the national schools which have recently been erected at Loughton, Essex. This pleasant village, situated almost in the heart of Epping Forest, has for some time needed improved schools in consequence of its growing importance. The present buildings are designed for 200 children, with residences for the master and mistress in the centre, and were erected principally at the cost of the Rector, the Rev. John Whitaker Maitland, aided by influential residents. The architect was Mr. Thomas Henry Watson.
